"But if you marry, you will not perpetuate the name, at any rate," I exclaimed. "Wives perpetuate their husband's names, not their own."

"So I should have supposed," she replied. "But the pater has a dodge for circumventing that. He wants me to marry some fellow who, in consideration of the fortune I am going to bring him, will sink his own identity in mine and adopt my name. In fact, I may as well tell you, the pater actually has the specific man cut and dried, and he wants to open up negotiations at once. Isn't it humbug?"

"Who is the man?" I inquired.

"Dollie Spencer," she answered, laughing contemptuously. "Fancy me marrying that namby-pamby, flabby little wretch. Oh, my aunt!"

"He would, at least, sink his identity in yours," I replied. "That is, so far as he has any identity to sink. Perhaps that's why your pater has pitched on him."

"It is," she nodded. "He knows I should absorb poor little Dollie in less than no time, and reduce him to a mere echo of myself. That's just what the pater wants. I'm to boss the show, and run it on the good old lines. My husband is to be a detail. However, as I told the pater, I don't want to marry at all, and I won't marry that invertebrate little nincompoop at any price; more especially as" (and, for the first time in our acquaintance, Hallie blushed slightly, and spoke with some evident embarrassment)—"if I care for any—any man, in that way—which I don't—that man is certainly not Dollie Spencer."

I opened my eyes. A sense of amazement seized me. Was it possible that this good fellow, the best of sportsmen and chums, had been guilty of the incredible folly of falling in love? But no; that could not be.

"You are not—you don't—I mean, you—you—aren't gone on any chap, are you?" I inquired.

"No-o-o," she answered, rather uncertainly. "In fact, I may say I'm quite sure I don't care for any man just in that way. But if—well, if I have to marry somebody, there's only one man I could possibly consider."

"And who is he?"

"You won't tell anybody?"

"Of course not."

"Well, it's Reggie Toogood," she answered.

"Reggie Toogood! The curate?" I ejaculated. "To be sure, for a parson, Toogood's not a bad sort. His cricket's quite up to county form, and he's a scratch man at golf, and he got his blue at the 'Varsity for Rugger—but a parson, my dear fellow, and a High Church parson at that, with all sorts of heretical ideas about the cruelty of sport, and the seriousness of life, and the necessity of tectotalism—you would never get on with such a chap, Hallie, and I'm perfectly certain your pater wouldn't hear of him."

"As to the latter part of your statement, you are perfectly correct," she answered. "The pater would not hear of Reggie Toogood. In fact, he got into a regular tantrum when I mentioned his name. We had quite a set-to on the subject. 'I can't understand why you jib so at Reggie Toogood's cloth, dad,' I told him, 'I always thought you were a staunch "Church and State" man.' 'So I am,' he answered, getting very excited—you know how the pater always does when you argue with him—'the Church in its place and the State in its place; and the Church's place here is the Rectory, not the Manor. That old Rector has three unmarried daughters. If Toogood wants a wife, he had better take one of them. I'm sure it would be an act of Christian charity, poor girls! But I'll have no black-coated fanatic bossing it here, at Simcox Manor, when I'm dead and gone, and so I tell you plainly.'"

"And how did it end?" I inquired.

"Oh, it ended as it generally does when the pater and I come to loggerheads—in our both declining to give way. And there, for the present, the matter rests," she replied. "The pater's in an awful stew with me because I won't take on Dollie Spencer; and I feel most horribly worried because, though he insists on my marrying, he has set his face against the only man whom I could possibly contemplate as a husband. Altogether, it's the most confounded state of affairs, and goodness knows what the outcome will be."

"Excuse my making the remark, my dear fellow," I observed, "but isn't it rather premature to discuss the question at all, either as regards Spencer or Toogood, until you have reason to suppose that they are—ahem!—willin' Barkises?"

"Oh, as to that," she replied, "I know, and the pater knows, that I could annex poor little Dollie Spencer, at any moment, if I wanted to; and Reggie Toogood" (again that tell-tale flush), "well, I know for certain that he's gone on me, because—because——"

"He has told you so?" I interjected.

"He has as good as told me so," she answered, with an embarrassed air, "and upon the slightest encouragement from me he would speak out still more plainly. Hitherto I have choked him off, not wishing (as I have already said) to marry at all. But if I have to marry, I shall not choke him off any longer," she declared, in decisive tones.

"But, my dear chap," I answered, "you would never get on with Toogood. Your tastes and ideas are utterly diverse. You are both as masterful as ever you can stick——"

"Oh! he's very much in love with me—absurd as it may sound in relation to a tomboy like myself," she interposed, "and, therefore, he'd yield to me in everything."

"My good fellow! As if that sort of love ever lasted beyond the period of the honeymoon!"

"Possibly it may not. Anyway, if ructions do supervene, I'll back myself to come out on top," she replied, confidently.

"I think you very likely will, in the long run; but it will mean no end of wrangling in the meanwhile."

"Oh, I rather enjoy wrangling. I'm a born fighter, you know," she answered. "However, the whole thing remains in abeyance for the moment. I have first to make the pater see reason. And I say, Dick."

"Well, old boy?"

"If you can give me a leg up in the matter, I know you will, won't you?"

"Of course, I will," I answered.

"Shake hands on it, old pal," she said.

We shook hands on it, and then the subject dropped. Hallie was unusually silent for the rest of the ride. So was I. I wouldn't have told her so for worlds, but I was rather disappointed in her. Such a good fellow, such a good sportsman, and (as I had always supposed) so superior to the sentimental rot that is called love. And now for her to confess that she was sweet on an infernal curate! What a falling off from my old chum!

The thing worried me. I hate to see a good chap go wrong. It also worried Hallie, though for a different reason. Her pater kept persistently pressing the marriage question. He said that he was getting old, and his health was rather shaky, and that it therefore behoved Hallie to range herself, satisfactorily, without delay. But he would harp on Dollie Spencer, and he wouldn't hear of the curate. So matters remained at a deadlock.

Some six weeks later, when Hallie and I were out fishing together—with very little heart on her part, as I was sorry to see, considering the cause—she laid down her rod on the bank (though the trout were rising like good-'uns), and said that she really must have a serious talk with me.

"I am most fearfully worried," she said. "The pater has been pounding away at this blessed marriage question worse than ever, and something's got to be done, else he will give me no peace. But I won't take on Dollie Spencer, and I mayn't take on Reggie Toogood; and, altogether, it's the very deuce of an impasse. Now Dick, old man, I want your help. You said you'd give me a leg up, didn't you?"

"I did; and anything I can do, I will do, dear old fellow. You know that."

"As far as I can see," she went on, "there's only one way out of the difficulty. I must compromise. That is to say, I must give up Reggie Toogood (conditionally upon the pater's forbearing to press Dollie Spencer) and take on some other man who is tolerably agreeable to us both."

She stopped, regarding me inquiringly, as if to gauge how far her suggestion had my approval.

"Sounds simple enough, if you can find the other man," I replied. "That appears to me to be the crux of the matter."

"Oh, it's no crux—at least, I hope not," she answered. "I believe I have found him already."

"The deuce you have, old boy. Who is he?"

"You," said Hallie, calmly.

"ME!" I ejaculated, almost jumping out of my skin.

"Yes; YOU," she rejoined, without turning a hair. "I know there's no sentimental nonsense or anything of that kind between us. But we're the best of chums, we understand each other perfectly, we have precisely the same tastes, and we have always got on A1 together. Moreover—which is a matter of at least equal importance—the pater rather likes you, and I have little doubt he would compromise on such a basis. So, looking at the matter all round, old chap, I really think you must take me on."

"But the idea of marrying you never entered my head," I cried. "I like you awfully, of course—better than any one I know; but not in that way."

"Same here," she replied, coolly. "The idea of marrying you never entered my head—until I was driven into this confounded corner; and then, on thinking it over, I came to the conclusion that if I had to pass my whole life in one man's company, there's no man (Reggie Toogood being barred) in whose company I'd so soon pass it as in yours. If you object, however, or, as is quite possible, want to marry some one else——"

"I certainly want to marry no one else," I said. "I don't want to marry anybody at all, and I'd much rather keep you as you are, the best of pals and chums."

"Well, and can't we remain the best of pals and chums, even if we are married?" she rejoined. "For my part, I see no reason against it. We should be just as we were before marriage, plus the accident of a wedding-ring. That is all."

"Rather a big 'all,' dear chap."

"Well, do as you like, of course, Dick. I'm not going to press you. Only, if you could see your way to help me out of a tight place in the manner suggested, I should be most confoundedly grateful. Don't be in a hurry to answer. Perhaps you might like to think it over. To-morrow will do quite well, if you prefer to wait till then."

I was silent for some moments. Then, acting on a sudden impulse, I answered:

"Look here, Hal. I said I'd give you a leg up over this job, and I won't be so mean as to go back on my word to a chum. So, since you wish me to do so—why, hang it all, old fellow, I'll take you on."

Curious way of settling an offer of marriage, wasn't it? But that was exactly how it was done.

Hallie thanked me cordially, then we resumed our fishing as though nothing had happened. We fished until dusk. Then, when we could see no longer, we turned our steps homeward.

At length, we came to the point where our ways diverged, and were about to shake hands, as usual, on wishing each other good-night, when Hallie said:

"Seems rather silly, but now we're engaged I suppose we ought to kiss, oughtn't we, Dick?"

And half-mockingly, as if derisive of the silly convention, she lifted her face to mine.

I kissed her upturned mouth, also more or less derisively, and then—and then—it was a most extraordinary thing, but the taste of those warm lips pressed against my own, acting with electrifying suddenness, opened my eyes, on the instant, to something alike in her and in myself—an inexpressible, ecstatic something that I now knew to have been long existent, but of which I had never till now been conscious.

Perhaps Adam felt that way when he kissed Eve for the first time—who shall say? And perhaps, after the awakening experience of that first kiss, he went on to do what I did now—repeat it again and again, as if he could never tire of the process. At any rate, he was a fool if he didn't.

The first words I spoke—about a quarter of an hour later, so far as I could calculate—were:

"I say, Hal, you don't really care for that beastly curate?"

"No," said she, with emphasis, "not a twopenny—— I mean, not a button."

"Then why did you tell me you did?"

"The whole story of Dollie Spencer and Reggie Toogood," she answered, "was a pious fiction of my own, designed to give me the opportunity of introducing a certain subject to your notice, and so of bringing about a certain result. You see, I knew you really cared for me, though you yourself were not conscious of the fact; and as I could not arouse you to consciousness by direct methods——by the way, you've heard that rather profane song:

> If you can't get in by the Golden Gate,
> Get over the garden wall.

Haven't you, old boy?"

"Heard it? I should think I have. But what brings it into your head just now?"

"The fact that it is so eminently descriptive of my own proceedings in this instance. You see, I couldn't get in by the golden gate, and so" (with a roguish chuckle) "I—well, I just did t'other thing, and got—over the garden wall."

ART NOTES.

ARTS AND THE MAN.

ON Saturday afternoon I journeyed to New Bond-street, meaning to attend the press view of an Exhibition of Modern Photography, at the New English Art Club Galleries. As it happened, I was too late, because the press view only lasted until one o'clock. But I was not nearly so disappointed as I ought to have been, because the really interesting feature of the exhibition is Mr. Bernard Shaw, who was, I suppose, not there, and who has, as a matter of fact, nothing whatever to do with it. But he regards it with benevolent interest. I know that, because he has given special permission that a number of aphorisms on photography from his pen shall be prefixed to the catalogue by way of introduction. I think the organisers of the exhibition are to be warmly congratulated on this, because quite a number of people who might not be interested in the photographs will visit the show in order to read the catalogue, which is thus, as it were, immortalised.

We have all heard the old definition of the four stages of wisdom and how the wisest man is he who knows and knows that he knows. It was written a great many years before Mr. Shaw came into the world—otherwise the writer must have added yet a higher stage of wisdom—that of the man—I rather think that Mr. Shaw is so far the only human being who can claim it—who knows that he knows a great deal more than he knows—or, incidentally, than anyone else ever did, does, or can know. To take one instance only. Mr. Shaw, as his aphorisms show us, knows a great deal more about art and photography than any artist or photographer ever did know, unless, indeed, he be a photographer himself, and perhaps even then. He knows, for instance, that all the greatest painters who ever lived were very "second chop" sort of people indeed, and that they have acquired their great reputation only by presuming upon the humility of the photographer. And here I am compelled to turn aside to make a suggestion for a great historical photograph, which would also be a masterpiece of allegory. It would represent Photography as Andromeda chained to the rock of ignorant criticism. Mr. Shaw, as Perseus, should be shown rescuing her from the attacks of a many-headed dragon. I am not sure, now I come to think of it, that I should not prefer him as Saint George, but that is a mere matter of detail. Each of the heads should represent a great painter, Raphael, Rubens, Michael Angelo and the rest—and Mr.—I mean Saint George—should be knocking off one after another with blows of his weapon, which should, of course, be a pen, preferably, I think, a goose-quill. The adequate representation of such a subject would be far beyond the powers of a mere painter, but I have no doubt a photographer could make a very creditable job of it, with Mr. Shaw's assistance.

Let us return now to Mr. Shaw's prefatory aphorisms. He tells us that he told us six years ago that he had already told us more than twenty years previously that nine-tenths (or ninety-nine hundredths, he forgets which) of what was then done by brush and pencil would presently be far better done by the camera. He does not tell us whether that happy day has already arrived, thereby implying, of course, that we ought to enter the present exhibition and see for ourselves—which is really a very cunning way of advertising the show, and shows us yet a new side of Mr. Shaw's genius, which we have never hitherto understood to include advertising. But he goes on to tell us that he knows nothing funnier in criticism—thereby showing us incidentally that he does not concentrate his mind on what is immediately under his nose—than the assurance of the painter and his press-parasite, the art-critic, that all high art is brush work. This is an excellent example of the tremendous width of Mr. Shaw's knowledge. Hundreds and hundreds of us never knew that the painter and the critic regarded brush-work as the only high art. We believed them to include sculpture and possibly etching and lots of other things. We thought that some of them were even so misguided as to grant writing—especially such writing as Mr. Shaw's—a place among the arts, not to speak of music. May not, for instance, trumpeting, especially if it be upon your own instrument, sometimes be extremely high-artistic? We thought that they—the artists and critics, I mean—did not usually include engine-driving, say, or photography, among the Fine Arts, because in them the individuality of the man is subordinated to the machine, because, although he works the levers, presses the buttons, and so forth, it is the steam or the sunlight, as the case may be, that is the motive-power, and not the man's brain at all.

He tells us next—and it bears upon the same point—"the decisive quality in a photographer is the faculty of seeing things and being tempted by them." From this I judge that Mr. Shaw regards Adam and Eve as having been the first photographers, and St. Anthony as the patron saint of the craft—but that by the way. If, as I take it, he means that the photographer has to exercise his powers of selection in making a photograph, and is thereby placed upon an equality with a painter, then surely the man who dines à la carte is on an artistic equality with either of them—to say nothing of the cook. Similarly, the pavement artist is no whit behind Raphael. We are, indeed, like the gentleman in Molière—all of us artists without knowing it—with the possible exception of the makers of aphorisms, who can say the first thing that comes into their heads without having to worry about making selections.

"Velasquez," says Mr. Shaw, "could have drawn Philip better with a telephoto lens than with his brush." (It might be interpolated that Mr. Shaw has frequently shown his power of "drawing" people better with a pen than with a lens—but that is a detail.) This shows us, again, the tremendous insight possessed by Mr. Shaw into the true aim of a portrait. Most of us thought that it was not so much to exactly reproduce the sitter's features as to express his whole personality—to reproduce the soul as well as the body. To take a concrete—though wildly impossible—example. Let us suppose, for a moment, that Mr. Shaw concealed within himself a vast fund of, say, conceit, but that his features gave no sign of it, concealed it beneath a mask of contemptuous bonhomie. The brush, in the hands of a great painter, would set forth the conceit; the camera, in the hands of a great photographer, would show only the bonhomie. Which is preferable is, no doubt, a matter of taste.

With all his knowledge of the painter's arrogant assurance, Mr. Shaw is too benevolent a man not to bestow a pat of kindly patronage where he thinks it is deserved. Thus, in yet another aphorism, he tells us that Mr. Whistler has produced portraits of almost photographic excellence. But it does not really make things better for Whistler, for it only forces us to realise how much the world has lost by the fact that the painter of the "Portrait of My Mother" was not a photographer instead of a mere spoiler of canvas.

Quite the most striking of these photographic aphorisms comes at the end. "The photographer," says Mr. Shaw, "is free of that clumsy tool, the human hand." Therefore, he argues by implication, the photographer's work touches a higher artistic level than does that of the painter. I am tempted, if it be not too presumptuous, to carry Mr. Shaw's line of thought a little farther. The penny-in-the-slot automatic piano, being free of that clumsy tool, the human hand, reaches a far higher level of artistic excellence than can a Paderewski or a Joachim. So, again, the donkey, being free of that clumsy tool, the human brain, can express far more artistic—not to say intellectual—thoughts far more artistically than can the mere human orator or writer, with but one possible exception.

All things considered, I really feel that, thanks to Mr. Shaw, I know almost, if not quite, as much about the exhibition of modern photography in New Bond-street as if I had actually been lucky enough to see it.

MUSIC.

ENGLISH BISHOPS AND BOGUS DEGREES.

THE gentle reader is requested not to start. It is not suggested that Dr. Winnington-Ingram and his eminent fellow occupants of the Episcopal bench are responsible for the employment of titular distinctions of no account or improperly obtained. Even to mention the word bogus in conjunction with a bishop is, indeed, enough to send something like a shiver down the backs of all rightly constituted persons, and it cannot be disclaimed too emphatically at the outset that no reflection is here intended upon the integrity and moral standing of those right reverend fathers who rule the destinies of the Church. Yet a connection does exist, none the less, between degrees of the sort specified, and those who, it might be supposed would be the last to be associated with such things.

Attention has been directed to the matter once more through the agency of a little controversy which has been proceeding in the columns of the Musical News concerning the precise value of the degree of Mus. D., which adds lustre to the name of that eminent musician, Mr. J. H. Lewis, the "Warden" of that august institution, the Guild of Church Musicians. This is not the first time that my contemporary has displayed a kindly interest in Mr. Lewis, who has also received a considerable amount of attention at one time or another in the columns of TRUTH. With that modesty and reticence so commonly associated with true greatness Mr. Lewis has always displayed a touching disinclination to explain the precise circumstances in which he became possessed of the imposing distinction referred to. It is, however, some years now since he suffered it to become known that no less renowned a seat of learning than the University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, U.S.A., was its actual source of origin, and further, that his sponsor had been one no less eminent than the late Archbishop of Canterbury.

The fault of mincing his language was one never imputed to Dr. Temple, and his reply to a letter subsequently addressed to him on the subject certainly lacked nothing in respect of its directness. "I certainly do not think," he wrote, "a degree given after the manner in which degrees are given at the University of the South is worth much. The degrees of universities are of very different values; and Mr. Lewis has obtained a degree which is of no value at all." In another letter Dr. Temple explained that his testimony on Mr. Lewis's behalf had related only to the respectability of certain persons who had made application on his account; and so much there was no difficulty in crediting. Certainly a strong effort of the imagination would be needed to conjure up a picture of the late Archbishop putting Mr. Lewis through his paces in a musical examination. Mr. Lewis received his degree, then, on the strength of a recommendation which, however obtained, was certainly not based on first-hand knowledge of his eminent musical attainments, which, it is hardly necessary to say, are so well known to the world at large.

Still, however, there were those who wished to know more, and in the result an offer was made of £5 5s., to be paid to the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians if the actual originals of Dr. Temple's certificate and certain other documents could be produced. Dr. W. H. Cummings and the Editor of Musical News were agreed to as adjudicators of the little dispute, and the result of their investigations has just been made known. "We have," they report, "carefully examined all the documents submitted to us, including those forwarded by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of the South, and have failed to discover any satisfactory evidence of the circumstance and manner of the alleged signature of the late Bishop of London (Dr. Temple)." The University of the South, when written to on the subject, forwarded, it seems, in reply, not the certificate of Dr. Temple, but one dated June 25, 1886, signed by the Bishop of Rochester, which was stated to be a duplicate of that which had been received from Dr Temple on behalf of Mr. Lewis. Naturally, the adjudicators were unable to accept this as supplying the evidence which they required, and hence their conclusion is that quoted. From what has been already said, however, there would appear to be no doubt that Dr. Temple did sign a certificate of some sort on Mr. Lewis's behalf, though precisely how this was obtained, and to what effect it ran, are matters in doubt.

But if obscurity still exists as to Dr. Temple's certificate on Mr. Lewis's behalf, the investigation of the mystery has at least served to throw light on a matter which is, perhaps, of even greater importance—to wit, the general practice of the Sewanee seat of learning here concerned in relation to these degrees conferred in absentiâ, in return for cash payments, upon British recipients. For on the back of the certificate signed by the Bishop of Rochester, which was forwarded by the Vice-Chancellor of the University, was printed, with blanks for dates, the following form:—

University of the South,
Sewanee, Tennessee, . . . 188 .

DEAR SIR,—Yours of . . . instant in regard to Degree of . . . has been received. If you will be so good as to obtain the signature of the Bishop of your Diocese to the Certificate printed on the reverse of this, and forward it to our Commissary, the Rev. F. W. Tremlett, D.C.L., St. Peter's, Belsize Park, London, it will give me great pleasure to lay your application before our Board of Trustees next August.—Your obedient servant, TELFAIR HODGSON, Vice-Chancellor.

From this it will be perceived, therefore, that all that it is requisite for any one to do in order to become a Mus.D., a D.C.L., or what not, of Sewanee, is to obtain the signature of a bishop, who may know as little of him as Dr. Temple knew of Mr. Lewis, and to forward this, with the needful fees, per the University's British agent, to Tennessee. And further, it will be gathered that so brisk is the trade done in "degrees" of this kind that the University authorities find it desirable to keep printed forms in stock for the purpose of answering applicants, and to maintain a "Commissary"—himself, by the way, a Sewanee D.C.L.—in London to look after its business under this head. That not the slightest test of any academic kind as to the applicant's fitness is required it is hardly necessary to say. In no previous case, indeed, has the thing been done quite so unblushingly. Trinity College, Toronto, was a pretty bad instance of this class of traffic, but in that case at least an "exercise" of a kind was required before the degree was granted and even Harkins, of Chicago, asked for a "thesis." Sewanee only wants a form filled up and signed, and the needful cash. To what extent the business is still being carried on I am not aware, but it is certainly to be hoped that it is no longer being conducted with episcopal connivance. What is astonishing is that such co-operation should ever have been obtained at all. But then, was it not written long ago that the children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light?

Smetana's "Die Verkaufte Braut," which was revived at Covent Garden last week, has been described as a Bohemian opera in the sense in which Glinka's "Life for the Czar" is a Russian, Moniuszko's "Halka" a Polish, and Erkel's "Hunniadi" a Hungarian opera, and certainly it is worthy of being ranked with any in respect of the charm and brightness of its music. It is more than ten years now since the work has been heard in London (at Drury Lane in 1895), the reason being, no doubt, that we have no house really suited to the performance of operas of this class, for which Covent Garden is, of course, too large. This is by no means to suggest, however, that the present performances of Smetana's work are not thoroughly to be enjoyed, and if the first performance seemed to fall rather flat last week, the deficiency rested, I am afraid, with its hearers.

There is point, indeed, in the humorous remark of one critic that the management should put up notices next time to the effect that laughing is permitted during a comic opera. As it was, Smetana's gay and sparkling work was listened to in a manner which must certainly have convinced our visitors more than ever that we take our pleasures sadly. The management were, however, partly to blame for keeping the auditorium in darkness, and thereby preventing the audience from following the dialogue. The performance was a very good one, with Herr Naval and Frau Bosetti in the principal parts and Herr Schalk in the conductor's chair. An unusual feature of "Die Verkaufte Braut," by the way, is its part for a stuttering personage, and, curiously enough, Smetana introduced a similar character into another of his works, "The Two Widows," in defiance of the fact that stammerers never stutter when they sing.

At Covent Garden this week "Die Meistersinger" is being given this afternoon (Wednesday), with Ackté and Herold, and "Fidelio" is announced for to-morrow under the direction of M. Ysaye, with Lefler-Burckhardt and Ernst Kraus in the leading parts.

A Covent Garden season without some controversy over the lighting arrangements would be quite unthinkable. In spite of constant complaints the management stick to their light-saving policy, with the result that many worthy folk who like to know what they are listening to find their enjoyment of the performances seriously diminished. Under the circumstances would not a compromise meet the case? Very few people nowadays would like to have all the lights on during a performance of, say, "Tristan," or "Die Walküre," since everyone must recognise that the stage is thrown up far more effectively and attention is more readily concentrated on the performance when the auditorium lights are lowered. But is it really necessary that they should be turned right out, as is the practice at present? If they were turned down instead of being wholly extinguished the same end would be secured, while at the same time those wishing to follow the book of words or the score would be enabled to do so. It is certain that half the tedium experienced by most people at a Wagner opera is due to their inability to follow the actual dialogue. Many musicians, again, find the utmost delight in following the music with the score, and it would inconvenience no one if they are allowed to do so. It is surprising in view of the constant appeals which have been addressed to them on the subject, that the management do not see their way to meet the wishes of their supporters.

There have been a good many interesting concerts lately. At the Æolian Hall, on Thursday, Professor Hugo Becker and M. Camille Chevillard, the well-known conductor of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris, co-operated for the benefit of Messrs. Broadwood's subscribers, and were heard in a new 'cello sonata—a blameless work—by M. Chevillard, among other things. On the same evening Handel's "Alexander's Feast" and Parry's setting of the "Pied Piper of Hamelin" provided a piquant contrast at the Royal Choral Society's concert at the Albert Hall. On Saturday, Herr Kreisler was again one of the soloists at Messrs. Chappell's ballad concert, at which Miss Johanne Stockmarr, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and other well-known performers also appeared.

On the same afternoon, at the Bechstein Hall, Mr. Frederic Lamond proved his mettle once again as a Beethoven player, giving five of the sonatas in his best style, to the vast satisfaction of a big audience. Monday brought an interesting event in the first appearance in England of the famous Rosé Quartet, of Vienna, at an "extra" concert of the Broadwood series. They play superbly, and made a great impression. In the evening Richter directed another of the London Symphony concerts, Strauss's "Zarathustra" being one of the works heard; while for Tuesday was fixed the début of Miss Marie Stuart, a new contralto of whom such high hopes are entertained, at Miss Marie Hall's farewell concert preparatory to a long tour abroad.

The appointment of M. Messager, in conjunction with M. Broussan, to succeed M. Gailhard in the management of the Paris opera will obviously necessitate a change also in the direction of affairs at Covent Garden. It is understood, however, that since he does not enter on his new duties until next year, M. Messager will be able to act in his old capacity at Covent Garden during the coming season. After this it will be necessary to find a successor, and gossip is already busy with the names of more than one possible candidate.

Meanwhile, as director of opera in Paris, M. Messager's term of office is likely to witness some notable changes, some of which will hardly be carried into effect without considerable friction. The abolition of a certain privileged class of operatic habitués seems likely, in particular, to provoke opposition. We are told, in this connection, that no fewer than three thousand gentlemen of all ages are at present allowed to haunt in a way which M. Briand, the Minister of Education, stigmatises as "abusive," the foyer of the opera. These individuals, it is further explained, are lovers of the opera who find their chief attractions, not on the stage, but behind the scenes, while their presence, as a rule, adds nothing to the receipts of the house. M. Briand, bold man, proposes to make a clean sweep of them.

Another drastic change contemplated, euphemistically described as a measure of "social hygiene," is the transference of the children's ballet school from the theatre itself to a separate hall, where the young dancers will be under feminine supervision. Then certain important structural alterations in the theatre itself are to be effected; there are to be more stringent provisions aiming at the more perfect presentation of the works in the répertoire; and under various other heads reforms are to be introduced. Happily M. Messager has always shown himself to be a man of liberal ideas, and no doubt M. Briand will find him in no way indisposed to second his efforts.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, on the "Latest Phases of Music," proved not less lively than was anticipated. It showed no little courage on the part of one in Sir Alexander's position to speak his mind so plainly concerning some of his most eminent contemporaries. Naturally his remarks concerning Strauss were listened to with particular interest, and clearly the composer of "Ein Heldenleben" would meet with short shrift if he presented himself at the Royal Academy of Music. Lustily, indeed, was the professorial ferula applied to his hapless person. A jumble of cacophonous sounds, impossible or puerile subjects, hideous combinations of notes, disgusting excesses, mere barn-storming effects—these were only a few of the vigorous criticisms which Sir Alexander applied to Strauss's work. At the same time, Sir Alexander did not shrink from admitting that here and there Strauss's compositions contained passages of great beauty and power.

Meanwhile, "Salomé," for which Sir Alexander reserved his choicest epithets, goes on from strength to strength, so far as public performances are concerned, and in America, as in Europe, has emphatically proved its drawing power—to the horror of Mr. Comstock and his supporters. "An exudation from the diseased and polluted imagination of the authors," is the genial verdict of one authority; but from the box-office point of view, at least, it has clearly been a sensational success. It is stated, indeed, that the work must be reckoned, from the financial point of view, the most popular opera ever written. But this is certainly a rather misleading way of putting it. "Salomé" has been an enormous financial success so far simply on account of its sensational and unsavoury subject and the amount of discussion and notoriety which have resulted therefrom. When it has been before the public ten or twenty years, and has drawn audiences steadily throughout that period, it will be time to consider its claims to be regarded as a popular work.

A charming little birthday book, compiled by Sir Frederick Bridge, has just been issued by Messrs. Bosworth and Co. While chronicling the birthdays of famous musicians, it provides appropriate Shakespearean quotations for each in English and German.

SEEGER'S HAIR DYE.—Dyes the hair by merely combing through. 2s. the Case, or Trial Bottle, mailed free from observation, 7d.—HINDE'S Ltd., 1A, Finsbury, London.

For his own birthday Sir Frederick uses the following quotation from "Twelfth Night":—

Vio.: Save thee friend, and thy music; dost thou live by thy tabor?
Clo.: No, sir, I live by the church.
Vio.: Art thou a churchman?
Clo.: No such matter, sir: I do live by the church; for I do live at my house, and my house doth stand by the church.

Perhaps "The Westminster Bridge Birthday Book" would have been a better title than "The Shakespeare and Music Birthday Book" which it bears on title page and cover.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Heine's witty saying that the nobility, like the Jesuits and the devil, only exist so long as we believe in them, applies, à fortiori, to kings. Kings are what they are in Russia and Germany, and were what they were in England and France, solely because of the superstitious belief in them of their subjects. In Mr. Bradby's studies from court life in the later years of Louis XIV., "The Great Days of Versailles" (1) e.g., you find the following extract from that prince's memoirs:—

He who has given men kings has willed that they should be respected as His lieutenants, and reserves for Himself alone the right of judging their conduct. His will is that whoever is born a subject should obey blindly.

In fact, as Mr. Bradby says, Louis XIV. regarded his kingdom much as a man with a passion for horticulture regards his garden, from which he would remorselessly tear up what he chose to consider weeds, and arbitrarily arrange and rearrange, root out and replace what it pleased him to regard as flowers. As for his neighbours' gardens, they were to be ravaged relentlessly, as a duty to God! If this should seem to you an exaggeration of the views of himself and of his duty which Louis XIV. was taught from his earliest childhood, I can only refer you to the catechism composed for the use of the young Prince Godeau, Bishop of Venice. It took the form of an imaginary dialogue between Villeroy, the gouverneur of the young king, and his royal pupil. After assuring the boy that "You are the handsomest child in the world, the visible and authentic image of God; and your Majesty should always remember that you are a Vice-God"; it proceeded to inculcate the god-like duty of desolating the world by war.

The great and shining qualities which we see in all conquerors give them a claim on our esteem, although they make the world a desert. Wars are storms which serve to purge the earth as tempests purge the air. Conquerors who depopulate the world are ministers of God. Widespread desolations, being periodic and fatal, have their reason and necessity, and if they meet us on their path, let us bow gratefully to the immutable decrees that order the world. Resistance and affliction of spirit are a secret murmur against Providence.

This from a Christian bishop, who, moreover, was himself the gentlest and most charitable of men! If ordinary war, however gratuitous, is the duty of a vice-god, how much more war against heretics? To understand such ferocious treacheries as the massacre of St. Bartholomew and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, you must read the catechism which this gentlest of prelates—Godeau—composed for the instruction of the young king. Here is a characteristic passage from it:—

How fatal has been the so-called Reformation! Whoever introduces schism into faith introduces it also into the loyalty which is due to the king. Since there is a connection between the laws of the State and Divine law, whoever disturbs the one disturbs the other, and is equally guilty of lèse majesté. Consequently he deserves to be punished. Religion teaches subjects to reverence the king without having seen him, just as they worship God without seeing him. Therefore royalty has an interest in supporting the Papal See, the cardinals and ecclesiastics who are the depositaries and ministers of this doctrine.

Indeed, in reading Mr. Bradby's book, you again and again recall these lines from the "Dunciad":—

For sure if Dulness seems a grateful day,
'Tis in the shade of arbitrary sway.
O! if my sons may learn one earthly thing,
Teach but that one sufficient for a king;
That which my priests, and mine alone, maintain,
Which, as it dies or lives, we fall, or reign.
May you, my Cam and Isis, preach it long,
The right divine of kings to govern wrong.

Nor was it only the Church that was responsible for Louis' extravagant ideas of his vice-divine place and power. The nobles also who made themselves his footstool invited all the humiliations they endured. Perhaps the most suggestive story in the volume is that of the monstrous flattery offered Louis by the Governor of Paris, the Duc de Montbazon, and of the complacency with which it was accepted by the king. Louis sent to the Duke a letter by a footman, who presented it just as his grace was sitting down to table. M. de Montbazon read the letter, wrote a reply, handed it to the footman, who bowed and turned to depart. "No, no," said the duke, "as you have come from the king, you must do me the honour of dining with me." The footman did what he could to escape from such an embarrassing honour, but the duke insisted not only upon his sitting down to table with a large and distinguished company, but also on giving him the place of honour and on helping him first. Dinner over, the duke humbly escorted the footman through the rooms and the hall to the steps, and took there respectful leave of him. "The king," says Mr. Bradby, "used often to relate this story, and seldom failed to add, 'That is what I call savoir vivre.'" The least that can be said for this engrossing volume is what its author claims for it in its preface—that it reconstructs from familiar material a picture of Court life at Versailles in the later years of Louis XIV., and gives interesting biographies and speaking portraits of some of the most prominent personages of that stirring time. I fear that the aptest motto for Mr. Edge's interesting and suggestive "An Irish Utopia" (2) would be Hood's

Utopia is a pleasant place,
But how shall I get there?
Straight down the crooked lane,
And all round the square.

Mr. Edge's object in writing the book is the promotion of the unity of Christendom, and that an Irish K.C. of his ability and with his knowledge of his country should expect Ireland to lead the way to such a Utopia is, what Dr. Johnson wittily called a second marriage, "a triumph of faith over experience." The truth is, as the Catholic church has all along perceived, the only way to keep men thinking alike in religion is—to use an Irishism—to keep them from thinking at all—to make a desert of thought and to call it peace. But "An Irish Utopia" is extremely interesting, at once as a picture of Ireland as it was half a century since, and as a romance having for its culminating chapter an admirably described trial. Unlike most novelists who hinge their stories on sensational trials, Mr. Edge is here on sure ground, and he makes the utmost of his technical skill and knowledge. Not the least charm of this "Utopia" is the kindliness and geniality which breathe through its every chapter. Miss Bradford Whiting's "The Plough of Shame" (3) is a story of mediæval Italy, in which Michael Angelo himself figures, not always to his credit. Miss Bradford Whiting has thoroughly saturated herself with the history of the times she describes, and she makes thrilling use of all its terrors and treacheries, torturings, poisonings, plagues, and pestilences. Only the hero of a novel could survive all the dangers and tortures to which Domenico Montani is subjected, and he certainly earns the love of the divine Ilaria, if, as Heine says, "To be wholly loved with the whole heart one must be suffering: pity is the consecration of love; is perhaps love itself." I do not know when I have read a more thrilling tale than "The Plough of Shame." "Abbots Verney" (4), a singularly clever novel, is perhaps marred by its very cleverness, since the author is so much absorbed in making her characters think and talk brilliantly that she forgets to make them act. Besides, the reticent hero is uninteresting, his quixotically honourable grandfather is incredible, while the lame and impotent conclusion of the story, is at once unnatural and disappointing. If the hero of "Abbots Verney" is uninteresting, the young gentleman who plays that part in Lucas Cleve's "Selma" (5) is despicable, and has his dastardliness thrown into relief by the Griselda-like devotion to him of the two women he betrayed. Indeed, you get almost as impatient with their dog-like devotion to so unworthy a creature as with his unworthiness.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

"The Russian Government and the Massacres" (John Murray, 2s. 6d. net) is a translation of a book by M. Semenoff, to which Mr. Lucien Wolf has contributed an introduction. It is a powerful indictment of the Russian Government in respect of its responsibility for the "pogroms"—those massacres of Jews which Mr. Wolf asserts are openly managed and prosecuted by the uniformed servants of the State.

"The Allies" is the title of a book by Major-General Sir Henry Colville on the Anglo-Japanese alliance which will be published next month by Messrs. Hutchinson and Co.

Mr. Heinemann has just issued the sixth and seventh volumes (price 4s. each) of "The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen," the former containing "The League of Youth," and "Pillars of Society," and the latter "A Doll's House" and "Ghosts." Each volume has a biographical and critical introduction by Mr. William Archer, who is also responsible for the translations of the plays "in the sense that he has exercised an unrestricted right of revision."

Next month Messrs. Chatto and Windus will commence the publication of a series of books with illustrations in colour, the first being "Switzerland and Its People." The text of this volume is from the pen of Mr. Clarence Rook, and the illustrations will include fifty-six reproductions from water-colours by Mrs. Effie Jardine.

Mr. Frederick Lawton's "Life and Work of Auguste Rodin," recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, price 15s., is illustrated with portraits of the famous sculptor and numerous photographs of his masterpieces. Most of the biographical facts recorded in the book were obtained by Mr. Lawton from M. Rodin himself, so that in this respect it may be regarded as authoritative. In dealing with M. Rodin's art, Mr. Lawton writes from the point of view of an enthusiastic admirer.

"The Kinsman," by Mr. Alfred Sidgwick, which Messrs. Methuen are publishing, is the farcical story of a rich man and his "double," the former being a gentleman and the latter an ill-educated Cockney clerk. In turn each man finds himself in the other's shoes, and all sorts of diverting complications arise. The book has eight illustrations by Mr. C. E. Brock.

Alike for completeness and ease of reference, "Cassell's Book of Quotations" (10s. 6d. net) eclipses any work of the kind that has previously been published. Mr. W. Gurney Benham is said to have been engaged upon its compilation for nearly twenty years. One of the special features of the book is the inclusion of quotations from eminent living writers, and another is the collection of proverbs, popular sayings, and legal terms. The volume contains no less than 1,280 pages, and the quotations with which it is packed are admirably indexed.

Mr. David Christie Murray seems to have become a "whole-hogger" in sensational fiction as well as in fiscal policy. One incident in an early chapter of "The Penniless Millionaire" (John Long, price 6s.) is the drowning (through a yacht being accidentally sunk by a warship) of every member of an enormously wealthy family of Jewish financiers—every member except the hero, who thereby becomes the heir to many millions. In the meantime, the hero is being kept a prisoner in an East End opium den by the agents of a Buddhist monastery in China, from which he had stolen "the great emerald known as 'The Dragon's Horn.'" Mr. Murray has done infinitely better work than this, but "The Penniless Milionaire" will at any rate receive the approval of readers who love a story full of ingenious complications and thrilling episodes.

Mr. Robert W. Chambers's new novel, "The Fighting Chance," which Messrs. Constable are publishing, presents an interesting picture of fashionable life in New York, and an animated description of a country house party, with its diversions—shooting, motoring, bridge, and flirtation. The story is illustrated by Mr. Fred. Pegram.

Under the title of "The World of Crime," Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are bringing out an English translation of a book which has met with great success in Paris. It contains the memoirs of M. Goron, late chief of the Paris detective police, given in a series of stories, which, beyond being of an exciting character, are all founded upon facts.

Mr. Ramsay Colles has edited a volume of the poetical works of Thomas Lovell Beddoes, which is to be published by Messrs. Routledge in their "Muses Library." The original editions of Beddoes have been long out of print, and this will be the first popular edition of his poems.

"The Advertisers' A.B.C.," issued by Messrs. T. B. Browne, Limited, this year attains its majority and fully retains its high position as "the" book of reference for advertisers all over the kingdom. It is interesting to see from the statistics given that the past year showed a still further increase in the number of periodical publications. Of the making of magazines and newspapers, as of the making of books, there seems to be no end.

Another specialist publication which supplies a very real want is Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son's "Annual." It is a vade mecum for newsagents compiled by experts which the up-to-date newsagent cannot afford to bo without.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—I wrote to you about postmarks last week, but my soul is wrathful now about telephones. I went into a public call office the other day—an automatic one—and rang up. A voice roared, "Box out of order!" and with a click I was cut off. Clutching at my temper, I rang up again, "Where is the nearest box I can use?" I asked. The voice answered, "How should I know? I don't know where the nearest box is!" The tones, which I am glad to say were not feminine, were distinctly impertinent. Surely there ought to be a notice pasted up when a telephone box is out of order, with the address of the next nearest available? Another grievance—in the automatic boxes, as soon as the number called responds, the operator says to the caller, "Put your money in, please," and two pennies have to be separately dropped in and a handle turned after each. The operator never tells the person called what the delay is, and when the money is in, the caller hears an exasperated voice saying: "Well, are you there or are you not?" with such embroideries on this theme as anyone may imagine. Surely there should be some means of averting all this friction. Our telephone system is far behind those of the other great cities of the world.

Bee has ordered a new frock for the play, merely because she went to the private view of the Playhouse last Friday. She says that hitherto a shabby skirt and rather squashed sleeves have not mattered, but in a theatre where the stalls are armchairs, with space for late-comers to pass in front of one's knees, without disturbing one, and room to sit with arms akimbo, too, the least one can do is to adorn these deliciously comfortable seats with a nice new crushable frock, in order to prove gratefully that it does not get crushed! I should not be surprised if Mr. Cyril Maude's generosity in space made quite a change in theatre dress, since he invariably puts on plays that everyone wants to see, and the old cry of "any skirt; it won't be seen," will not apply to his luxurious new theatre.

What would have become of us without Ardent stoves during the bitter weather we have had I cannot think. We had a large one in the hall going day and night, and the difference that it made in the temperature became very particularly apparent when one day our supply of oil ran short and we had to be without our Ardent for six glacial hours. Everyone who came into the house and observed the crimson glow and felt the delightful warmth, said: "Oh! what is this lovely stove?" Ours stood on a bright crimson mat, almost rose colour, and the ruby glass chimney turned this and the Turkey rug to an oriental richness of tint that was in delicious contrast with the bleak greyness of the weather. The bathroom pipes were kept from freezing by one of their Intense Heat portables, which burned there night and day.

Bee has a "Little Bijou" Ardent stove in her den, a room about 12 ft. square, and it warms it far better than a fire, half the heat from which escapes up the chimney. I love warmth, don't you? I almost dislike the people who go about rubbing their hands and stamping their feet and praising the seasonable weather. As to the bathers in the Serpentine, I acknowledge no kin with them. They are beyond the borders of what I recognise as of common humanity with myself. Did you read in the papers last week that one of them, while drying himself, found that his hair had frozen? I wonder if such performances as these are really beneficial to the human system? Not that I want to emulate them in any way. Never! I feel too utterly miserable when I am very cold.

Richard enjoys the cold! Whenever I read that verse in the Bible about "making men of one mind in a house," I think how nice it would be if men and women could be made of one temperature in a house. When a room is warm enough for me, it is too hot for Richard. I suppose that in the United States we could get a divorce for that if we wanted one. Incompatibility of temperature sounds quite legal.

Extract from a sale catalogue: "For sale or exchange, a bathchair capable of containing two persons in good condition." This beats the "gold-headed gentleman's cane" and the "perfect gentleman's residence" into fits.

Dinner at the Dieudonné is different from dinner anywhere else. There is a calm repose in the atmosphere of the very pretty room that one does not find elsewhere. There is no orchestra, and 90 per cent. of the visitors express their appreciation of this negative attraction. The waiters, even, seem to make less noise with the plates and dishes, spoons and knives, than elsewhere, and the jibes about the noise of smart restaurants that one reads every now and then are singularly inapplicable to the Dieudonné, smart as it is. The food is delicious. Their Crême Esau is a particularly good soup. We tried to trace out the genesis of the name, but could get no further than Esau's mess of pottage, potage, soup. The woodcock on toast was something to remember, so perfectly was it cooked, and the Marie Brizard ice was uncommonly good. Most delicious chocolates and menthes are handed round afterwards, wrapped in papers simulating sovereigns and half-crowns. Diners at the restaurant in Ryder-street take them home to their children, who appreciate them intensely.

Still further brilliance is lent to the ball got up by Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen in aid of Princess Christian's Windsor Crèche by the fact that the Duchess of Rutland, the Duchess of Sutherland, Lady Ludlow, Lady Castlereagh, Ellen Lady Inchiquin, and Lady Alice Leslie have now given their patronage. The Wharncliffe Rooms, which are to be beautifully decorated, will witness a gay assembly on Tuesday, the 5th. The string band of the Scots Guards is to supply the music, and dancing begins at 9.30.

Where is Barataria? I mean Gilbert and Sullivan's Barataria. It is somewhere quite near Venice, for the distance can be covered in a gondola, and that is not the kind of boat one would choose for a long voyage. There is somewhere (do tell me where) a Gulf of Barataria, and I suppose that is where the delicious preserved prawns come from. They are so nice sautés on the chafing dish in a little butter.

But why do I want to know, you may inquire. Because we were at the Savoy the other evening and heard "The Gondoliers." The scene of the second act is laid in Barataria. The music is delightful, so bright, so melodious, so exquisitely dainty, and, above all, so absolutely free from the flat inanity of which we have had so much of late years. Small wonder that there is record booking at the Savoy, and when such old favourites as "The Mikado," "H.M.S. Pinafore," "Patience," and "The Pirates of Penzance" are produced, there will not be nearly enough room for the crowds who will want to hear them. We admired very much the wonderful curtseys made by the Duchess of Plaza-Toro and her daughter. They were like "popper" in the American anecdote. They went flat. You remember that particular popper? His daughter, having been telling of the family travels, was asked how her father liked the crossings from New York to Liverpool. "Oh, popper? He goes flat," was her answer. Probably entirely untrue, but amusing. Poor popper! Perhaps he knew not of the efficacious Yanatas.

Poor, dear West Indies! They have been unfortunate of late years. We get such delicious things from them that one feels sorry to hear of the misfortunes of these beautiful islands, for selfish as well as general reasons. You know the grape fruit? It is extremely delicious, and the limes are in many ways preferable to lemons and are available for all the purposes for which lemons are used, besides being less than half the price. The shaddocks, too, are very pleasant to the taste, especially when treated, as by an American friend of ours, who mixes up the juicy part with sugar and liqueur in the most knowing way. The oranges are superb and most deliciously sweet, as an orange should be. I always think that an orange fails of its duty when it is not sweet.

Have you ever tasted West Indian pepperpot? For this and other savoury dishes consult the price list of the West Indian Produce Association, which gives excellent recipes for the preparation of the various delicious materials sent over here. So send for one to 4, Fenchurch Buildings, E.C. And do not omit to notice the very excellent mangoes in syrup and guava jelly, also the molasses procurable from Wipa. This last is a word, now familiar in our mouths, made up from the initials of the Association.

Do you think wedding gowns are ever hired out like men's dress suits? The average bridal gown is so exactly like its thousands of colleagues that it might be possible to make a profession of its loan. Although brides usually order their wedding gown before they have been tired out with hurry, they seldom expend any originality on it, and in due course rustle up the aisle swathed in satin and lace like nearly all their predecessors. I wonder how a man feels who watches his second bride approaching in the exact garments of his first? It is an unpropitious moment for such memories to arise; one can imagine him, if of a nervous temperament, peering through the veil and whispering: "Are you Mary or Ada?"

A pretty way out of this sameness is the historical idea, in which bride, bridesmaids, and pages are all dressed in the garments of some one period, skilfully adapted to modern use. Liberty's has just issued one of their illustrated booklets, called "Wedding Gowns," one part of which is devoted to sketches of historical bridal costumes, unaffected by change of fashion. The Puritan bride, for instance, is the perfection of simplicity—Orion satin simplicity, by the way, very soft and full of beautiful mobile shadows as the folds move. The plain bodice has no belt, but is finished with a cording, and there is a deep double cape or collar of the finest white lawn, falling well over the shoulders, and fastened with three little bows in front. The sleeves are turned back in small plain cuffs from the elbow, and have lower sleeves of lawn doubly gauntletted at the wrist. Her grown-up bridesmaids wear equally simple dresses, but approaching more nearly to the Stuart riding-coats. The little inner crossover vests are of soft white lawn, and they have broad straw hats, tied with ribbon, the brim bent down very becomingly in front. The child bridesmaids have the sweetest high-waisted frocks, with severe collars, and little Puritan caps. As to the page, he is also severe in outline, but very artistic.

With the Charles I. group we are faced with a curious resemblance to the Puritan, but simplicity has vanished. The daintiest of brides, in a plain skirt and tabbed bodice, breaks out into lace edgings wherever she can, and even her wreath is more worldly than that of her Puritan cousin. Her bridesmaids, too, are lace-edged, and they have bewitching bows. Under their great feathered hats are little lace caps, resting on the hair in a most delightful manner. The little girl bridesmaid has the cap without the hat, and her lace-edged collar and ribbon-threaded tabs are very sweet. A little silver embroidery further lightens her. As for the page, he is splendid in silver-embroidered satin, and where the girls have bows he has rosettes. He has a lace-edged collar, like theirs, but his satin knickerbockers, tied in at the knee, are all his own, and he carries a bravely befeathered hat.

The Empire dresses are charming. The bride has a high-waisted bodice of embroidery, over a lace vest, with a jewelled girdle. Her dress is of crêpe-de-chine. The bridesmaid's dress is muslin with many frills at the feet, and a fichu with long frilled ends. Her hat has two long feathers, one on either side. The little girl wears a cap, with a high-waisted dress; both she and the page are reminiscent of Greenaway children. These groups are not only remarkably pretty as they are, but each leaf on which they are sketched can be detached, and sent to Liberty with a list of the alterations one would like, when fresh sketches will be made and sent before any order is given. This same arrangement applies to the modern bridal garments included in the book, which combine art with smartness, and have all that softness and delicacy which have made of the proper name Liberty an adjective used round the five oceans and in a dozen languages to denote the graceful and the pliant in dress.

I have received the following from Mona:—

MY DEAR MADGE,—You ask, Why do a nurseryman's azaleas flower so much better than an amateur's? Is not the answer obvious? The one treats them badly and the other treats them well. As a rule, the amateur's aim is to get flowers, and when they are over the plant which has borne them is neglected, others that are still flowering, or about to do so, taking the late favourite's place. A nurseryman's aim, on the other hand, is to grow fine plants. That is the difference between the two—a very great difference, as you will admit. If, as often happens, plants that have finished flowering are thrust into some out-of-the-way corner of the greenhouse, left without water for days and never fed or re-potted, it is ridiculous to expect them to produce a good crop in the following year, especially as it is just at this time that they are making the new wood on which the flowers should be borne. There is, indeed, no season at which they require more attention. The first thing to be done, when the flowers of an azalea wither, is to remove them all. The formation of seed pods is a serious waste of energy, and if they are allowed to remain it is rarely that flowers appear on the shoots which issue from the spot where the pods have been. If re-potting is necessary, this is the time to do it. Clean pots should always be used. If they are new, they should first be soaked in water for twenty-four hours—for two reasons: to fill the pores with moisture, which they will otherwise absorb from the soil round the roots; and to remove the arsenic, which is generally associated with clay. If they are old, any green stain may be removed or prevented from gathering in them by pouring on an ounce of carbonate of copper enough ammonia water to dissolve it, and adding eight gallons of water, and soaking the pots in the solution. This will keep them clean for at least a year.

The most suitable soil for azaleas consists of peat and coarse sand, but if peat is not available turfy loam in lumps and leaf-mould make an excellent substitute. It should be made quite firm—indeed, rammed hard with a wooden rammer. This is an important detail in the cultivation of all, or nearly all, hard-wooded plants with fine fibrous roots. If they are grown in loose soil they are apt to produce long soft shoots, and in consequence bear comparatively few flowers. Azaleas require a great deal of water during the growing period, and for this reason there should be plenty of broken crocks in the pots, for without proper drainage the soil would soon get sodden—a deadly state of affairs for most plants, but especially for those of this class which includes heaths and rhododendrons. After having been re-potted, azaleas should be placed, not in a dark corner, but in the warmest and sunniest part of the greenhouse, and should be frequently sprayed or syringed, the object being to induce fresh growth to start as soon as possible. The moisture helps here by softening the bark and thus making it easier for the buds to break. As the season advances and the weather gets warmer, the plants will require more air to keep the new shoots sturdy and strong, and in summer they should be placed outside for a month or two to ripen the wood, but very carefully watched, so that the soil does not become dry. If your azaleas are treated in this way, I do not think you will have to complain again of their not flowering properly.

I scarcely think that you will be successful in growing hardy azaleas and rhododendrons. You see, your subsoil is chalk; that is the difficulty. It is useless to dig a hole, no matter how large, and to fill up with good soil. Sunk beds have been tried again and again, and have always proved unsatisfactory, the lime-laden water draining into them and eventually killing the plants. The lime seems to act upon them in much the same way as it acts upon gouty or rheumatic persons—by forming deposits which interfere with the circulation. By the way, I forgot to say that hard water should never be given to azaleas under glass, for the reason just mentioned. The only practicable method of growing these plants in your garden is to make raised beds for them, the larger the better. Here they may do fairly well for a time if you can keep the soil sufficiently moist in summer. That is the difficulty with these raised beds, the water drains away so quickly, but with a hose it should not be insuperable. At any rate, the method is far more likely to produce satisfactory results than sunk beds. A top dressing of litter will check evaporation from the soil in summer and reduce the amount of water required; or, if you object to that, cocoanut fibre may be used instead. The fibre is not expensive, only about five or six shillings a sack, and that quantity will cover a large area.

The propagation of azaleas is interesting work, but I doubt if you will find it worth while; bought plants are now so cheap, and so much better than any you are likely to raise yourself. Sometimes, it is true, instead of a single stem, there are a number, and if these are divided, each with its own roots, you get several fairly large plants at once. But the ordinary methods of propagation are very much slower. The slowest of all is sowing seeds. As years must elapse before the seedlings reach flowering size, and as a large proportion of them are almost sure then to prove not worth growing, I feel sure you will not try it. Cuttings of young ripe wood, taken off with a slight "heel," or scrap of older wood, will often strike if inserted in pots or boxes of sandy soil, and kept close and moist until they show signs of growth. Gentle bottom heat will assist rooting, but any attempt to force the pace is sure to result in failure. Layering is another method. It may be applied with advantage to old plants which have grown tall and straggling. By layering the branches, plants of comparatively large size can be obtained in a much shorter time than would be possible in any other way. Finally, azaleas may be grafted. It is by grafting that most of the new and valuable varieties are propagated by nurserymen, Azalea pontica being the stock generally used for the purpose.—Your affectionate cousin, MONA.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—Whatever changes of weather we have to go through, however searching and drastic, we possess at least in this season the sustaining knowledge that the days are growing longer. Come what come may—and a great deal is sure to come—is it not a joyful and hopeful thought to remember that we are well on the right side of the shortest day of the winter? A calendar which marks the risings and settings of the sun each day is just now a most comforting possession. It is a case—supposing one does not forget to change the date every morning on the block—of methodic virtue being its own reward. We learn for certain, and with the dead certainty, not to say cocksureness, of scientific knowledge, that the sun rises earlier and sets later each morning and evening respectively as the month goes on. Otherwise, personal experience would frequently teach us nothing on the subject. Last week, for instance, scientific knowledge was our great consolation. On many days we cheerfully believed without seeing, for the sun did not seem to trouble about rising at all, but just left a sort of grey twilight to itself. No matter how much the appearances were against it, however, we knew that the days were growing longer, and, as with the heart that "goes all the day," when merry, our hearts were, passably enough, kept up by scientific knowledge through the continued darkness. Fred, it must be said, ascribes the philosophic bearing towards the dark days more to bridge than anything else, for, of course, it was the natural resource in the long afternoons. One must hope that it was not a case of the Prince of Darkness in connection with the much-abused—in more ways than one—but still popular game.

This week we have no time to consider the weather, unless it forces itself on our attention, for the commencement of the Castle season engages all time and thought. We are plunged into quite a social vortex—engagements day and night, those of the latter including many important ones. Viceregal, like Royal, Court entertainments have always to be more importantly "dressed" than any others. Even when they are not ceremonials demanding a special full dress, we usually honour them with the best we can do when left to our own individual tastes. Perhaps we like doing our best in that way, we women; few of us ever spare ourselves in the manner of selecting and planning toilettes. What laborious days we live in the "cause," but no doubt it is the case that "The labour we delight in physics pain." The Castle season is expected to be a good one; in fact, Dublin starts with the idea of having an unusually brilliant time. "Say well and you will do well" is an excellent maxim; if we all mean to be brilliant, we surely shall be so this season. Lady Aberdeen is sure to do a great deal in the way of bringing pleasant variety into Viceregal entertainments. She has a kindly and reasonable manner of thinking of wider interests than merely "smart" ones. By the way, one wonders why Courts should so exclusively entertain a particular "smart" set, considering that there is no exclusiveness in the taxation which keeps up Courts. Don't you think, at least, that every one "courtable"—may not "hoffähig" be so translated?—should have a turn instead of giving all the turns to a select few? Courts should, like everything else, have their duties as well as their rights. But we all are so much fonder of our rights than of our duties, and so shameless in favouring them! Even the best of us, perhaps!

Dublin has filled for the Castle season. Amongst new arrivals last week were Sir William and Lady Butler, the Dowager Lady Clinton and the Misses Trefusis, Sir James and Lady Stronge and their daughters. Sir Herbert and Lady Plumer have taken a house in St. Stephen's Green. Lord Iveagh arrived last week, but Lady Iveagh was not with him, though she is expected to come, as she generally does at this season. She has been in delicate health, and was laid up for a long time last year in Dublin. Lord Iveagh takes a strong personal interest, not only in his great business, but in all the philanthropic works he is doing to benefit the poorer brethren in his native town. He is, as you know, a Dublin man and a graduate of Trinity College, now

R. GORDON, 32, OLD JEWRY, LONDON, E.C.

This company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring as a going concern the business of the City and Suburban Motor-Cab Company, Limited, together with their existing service of motor-cabs, and of further increasing the business by placing upon the streets of London an additional supply of motor-cabs and cars for public use, under contracts with the Société des Automobiles Unic (Georges Richard & Co.), manufacturers of the famous Unic cars, and with A. Darracq & Co. (1905), Limited.

The directors of the General Motor-Cab Company, Limited, in spite of the extension they intend giving to their own enterprise with the Renault motor-cabs, have, after careful consideration, decided that it is of great importance to their own undertaking to assure a friendly co-operation and alliance with this company's enterprise. They consider that, inasmuch as the workings of the Unic motor-cabs of the City and Suburban Moto-Cab Company, Limited, have demonstrated the excellence of the cars and the satisfactory financial results of the business, they are justified in favouring the development of this company's undertaking as an ally, and not treating it as a rival. The General Motor-Cab Company, Limited, has therefore undertaken to subscribe for a substantial sum in the share capital of this company, and will also be represented on the board by those of its directors whose names appear upon this prospectus. Arrangements are in progress so that this company's cabs may be garaged in the important premises now being erected by the General Motor-Cab Company, Limited, in the Brixton Road.

The Company will be in the favourable position of being able to place at the disposal of the public 200 additional Unic motor-cabs and 250 Darracq motor-cabs, and 50 Charron motor-carriages (the last-mentioned for special hiring), the orders for which have been placed with and accepted by, the Société des Automobiles Unic, by A. Darracq & Company (1905), Limited, and by Charron, Limited, respectively.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, Solicitors, and Brokers, and at the Offices of the Company.

called Dublin University, or, rather, it used to be erroneously, but popularly, called "Trinity."

Lord Shaftesbury is to be the Lord Mayor of Belfast this year, and has been residing at his residence, Belfast Castle. He inherited a large property in the North from his mother, and serious views of duty from his parental relatives. He was often in Dublin when Mr. Wyndham and Lady Grosvenor were at the Chief Secretary's Lodge. Like his sister, Lady M. Warrender, he is very musical and has a charming voice. Not one's usual idea of a Lord Mayor, is it? We are to have another literary and highly cultured Chief Secretary now in Mr. Birrell, who is, we hear, charming. One hopes that in sending us cultured Chief Secretaries in succession that there is nothing of the "one satiric touch" to suggest that "no nation wanted it so much." We feel that "birrelling" ought to be popular here, where we like life to be brightened by playful fancies and wit.—Yours ever, CLARE.

Try this recipe—young goose and chestnuts:—

Choose a fat young goose, ready trussed as for roasting. Mince the liver, cut an onion up small, and mix in it a tablespoonful of grated bacon. Now make a chestnut purée and mix it with the other ingredients, secure the end and stuff the bird at the craw. Sew it up safely, cover it with buttered paper, and roast it to a golden brown. Roasting before the fire is preferable.

These fillets of partridge à la Susette are also very nice indeed:—

Take the fillets of three partridges, separate the mignon from the upper fillet, sautez the larger ones with butter to set the flesh, and press them between two dishes. When they are cold, trim them, dip them in beaten eggs and bread crumbs, and fry them in salad oil. Dish them on a border of quenelle made with the flesh of the legs, arrange the mignon fillet on the top (which should be curled round with a slice of truffle in the centre and cooked in butter in the oven), garnish the centre of the fillets with a ragoût of cooked sweetbread, red tongue, truffles, and mushroom, all of which should be steamed in a little of the sauce. To make the sauce, it is necessary to have a nicely flavoured stock made from the bones of the birds; cook a couple of chopped shallots with butter in a stewpan, add the trimmings of the mushrooms and sweetbread, mix in a spoonful of potato fecule, and the reduced stock from the bones. Simmer the sauce at least half an hour, adding a glass of claret, then squeeze it through the tammy. Finish the sauce with a small piece of butter, the squeeze of a lemon, and a spoonful of chopped parsley.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "MR. AND MRS. VILLIERS."

THE YOKE. By Hubert Wales

[This day. 6s.

 Now and then a novel is issued which stands conspicuously forth as being of different mould to all others, and readers turn to it with avidity. Such was "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers" a first book by Mr. Hubert Wales, which straightway achieved distinction. In his new novel, "The Yoke," he displays a more startling originality and an even greater freedom. It may be in venturing to issue it the publisher will incur some adverse criticism, but be that as it may it will undoubtedly let loose the dogs of controversy. The advance bookings are very heavy, and those who would secure an early copy should place their orders at once.

The King's Wife.

By HÉLÈNE VACARESCO,

Author of "Kings and Queens I Have Known.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Decorated Cover, 6s.

THIS is a novel which will assuredly create a great sensation. The brilliant authoress was barely 18 when the Academy crowned her first volume of poems, "Chants d'Aurore."

The close friendship between the Queen of Roumania, Carmen Sylva, and Hélène Vacaresco is well-known, and also the romance of the projected marriage between the young poet and the royal prince of Roumania; this project was abandoned for State reasons, but it created an idyllic and legendary atmosphere round the authoress.

Her book, while pure fiction, may be said to mirror the mode of living and sentiments of certain royal personages, and probably no more intimate picture of Court Life from the inside has ever been published. It is a story full of passion and interest.

GAY & BIRD'S LIST

SIX VOLUMES OF HUMOUR.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

MR. PRATT.

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN.

MR. PRATT.

Daily Mail.—"It is a delightful tale. The book is full of genuine humour, and Mr. Pratt is racy of the soil."
Daily Telegraph.—"For those healthy people who like to laugh when they read, this is a book that may be heartily recommended."

THE NOVEL OF THE YEAR.
Third Edition called for within Fourteen Days of Publication.
ANOTHER 2,000 NOW READY.
Over 250,000 copies of this book have been sold in America.

THE HOUSE OF A THOUSAND CANDLES.

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Ladies' Field.—"From beginning to end it is one long thrill of excitement, and carries the reader breathlessly along from the first page to the last."
Daily Mail.—"Will recommend it heartily to all."
World.—"Brightly written, meriting the success we understand it has achieved in America."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s.

SEEING FRANCE WITH UNCLE JOHN.

By ANNE WARNER. Numerous Illustrations by M. W. PRESTON.
Yorkshire Post.—"Not since Jerome's 'Three Men in a Boat' do we remember a more amusing tale of travel."
Telegraph.—"Described with rare humour . . . decidedly entertaining."
Notts Guardian.—"A rollicking, laughable book, appealing to the same sense of humour as Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad' . . . the work gains immensely from the clever illustrations."

SUSAN CLEGG AND HER NEIGHBOURS' AFFAIRS.

By ANNE WARNER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.
Susan Clegg is an old spinster who has never been outside her little native village, she is the local reporter of news, and her manner of retailing it to her visitors is very amusing. She will be welcomed by all who enjoyed "Timothy's Quest" and "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch."

NOW READY, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, illustrated, 5s. net.

THE GREEDY BOOK.

A GASTRONOMICAL ANTHOLOGY.
By FRANK SCHLOESSER.
Author of "The Cult of the Chafing Dish."

A volume which will appeal to all those who love good dining and good literature.
London Daily Express.—"'The Greedy Book' is worthy of unreserved recommendation."
Tribune.—"Its wit has a flavour to season the simplest meal."
G. R. SIMS in Referee.—"Mr. Schloesser has brought gaiety to gastronomy, poetry to the 'plat,' culture to the cuisine, and wit to the wine cellar."

PUBLISHED MONDAY. Price 5s.

A REMARKABLE BOOK ON THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., the distinguished authority on Hygienic Science and Health Questions, is evidently a believer in Thomas Carlyle's doctrine that there is no utility in pointing out misfortunes unless you at the same indicate the remedy. In his remarkable little book, "The Art of Living," just issued from the press, Dr. Wilson not only points out that "Our first duty to ourselves is to check illness at the outset," but he follows up this admonition with the more welcome information how we are to do it. He, so to speak, says: "You have the evil of ill-health to fight. Now, here's the weapon to fight with. Strike for freedom." For example, he says: "Suppose a person has run down—feels languid and is easily tired. If he neglects this warning—for all such signs and symptoms are Nature's warning to us—the possibility is that he will pass further afield into the great lone land of disease. Can he do anything to save himself from such a disastrous result? In the vast majority of cases he can restore his vigour." How? Dr. Wilson tells his reader how without delay, adding at once this remarkable statement: "Probably he will be advised to take a tonic. This in the main is good advice. Unfortunately the number of tonics is legion, but if there exists any preparation which can combine in itself the properties of a tonic and restorative, and which at the same time can contribute to the nourishment and building up of the enfeebled body, it is evident such an agent must prove of the utmost value to everybody. I have found such a tonic and restorative in the preparation known as Sanatogen." How the distinguished author found this tonic he tells us in an interesting bit of autobiography. "Recovering from an attack of Influenza," he says, "and suffering from the severe weakness incidental to that ailment, Sanatogen was brought under my notice. I gave it a fair trial, and the results were all that could have been desired. In a short time my appetite improved, the weakness was conquered, and without the use of any other medicine or preparation I was restored to health." It is easy to believe that this experience led the doctor to make a thorough investigation into this specific which had served him so well. Sanatogen, he tells us, "combines two distinct elements, one tonic and the other nutritive." Further, it is no "secret" remedy, for, as he pertinently observes: "Its composition is well known, otherwise medical men would not prescribe it." What the tonic and nutritive elements of Sanatogen are and how they effect so much good Dr. Wilson describes in simple, convincing terms. The whole passage is too long to quote, but one important remark of the writer may be given, namely, that one of the principal elements of Sanatogen "represents the substance which actually forms a very important, if not the most important, constituent of our brain and nervous system." How, through regenerating the nervous system, Sanatogen restores the functions of the digestive organs, and by rebuilding the tissues compensates the wear and tear of latter-day life; how it does away with the need of stimulants, and cures the sick by the natural method of making the body strong enough to drive out disease—all this, in the delightful style of Dr. Wilson's language, makes engrossing and pleasant as well as instructive reading. This last contribution of Dr. Wilson to the literature of Health may certainly be calculated to carry joyful news to the ailing and weary. A limited number of complete specimen copies of the "Art of Living," by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., are being distributed free of charge. To obtain one of these copies the applicant must mention "Truth" in sending his name and address to the Publishers—F. Williams & Co., 83, Upper Thames St., London, E.C.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH OFFICE by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET-STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,455.

BEST SUGGESTION FOR A REDUCED SENTENCE ON STOKER MOODY.

The result arrived at by averagirg all suggestions sent in, and calculating the answer to two places of decimals, has been to show that 11·95 months imprisonment is the ideal sentence.

No Competitor has given these exact figures. But eight have suggested a term of twelve months, and the Prize of Two Guineas will be equally divided between them.

They are thus each entitled to the sum of 5s. 3d.

The noms-de-plume of the successful eight are:—BOBBIN, VERBUM SAT, VAN DAUB, BUCKS, GAME B, STEAM PIPE, KORAH, NEALE.

As some misapprehension appears to exist, may I call the attention of these, and of all other successful Competitors, to Rule 10?

BEST ORIGINAL PARODY OF CAMPBELL'S FAMOUS LINES ENTITLED "A THOUGHT SUGGESTED BY THE NEW YEAR."

I cannot say that the Parodies sent in for this Competition have been of high merit. But, in my opinion, the best of a rather moderate lot are those sent in by WALFORD and TREBOR NITRAM, both of which were printed in TRUTH, of January 2 last. The Prize of Two Guineas is, therefore, divided equally between those two Competitors.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,462.

I know, by experience, that we number among our Competitors many efficient writers of the lighter kind of verse; but our serious poets are, so far as I am concerned, still an unknown quantity.

I should like, therefore, to give them an opportunity of proving what they can do; and, to that end, I now offer the usual Prize of Two Guineas to:

THAT COMPETITOR WHO SHALL SEND IN THE BEST POEM, IN SERIOUS VEIN, DEALING WITH THE RECENT APPALLING EARTHQUAKE AT KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

The poem may be either in blank, or in rhymed verse, but should follow some recognised metre; and it must not exceed twenty lines.

Any aspect of the catastrophe may be dealt with, the only essential being that a serious point of view must be taken.

Apart from the fact that I wish to give our serious poets a chance, Competitors will themselves recognise that anything in the shape of humour or badinage would be totally out of place in so tragic a connection.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor should send in more than one poem.
(ii) All poems must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, February 11, at latest.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1.—SPECIAL FOREIGN.

BEST ANAGRAM OF THE WORDS: "THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND."

After careful consideration, I have decided to award the Prize of Two Guineas in this Competition to ENTEBBE, whose anagram, "A gifted trio-land to their kind guide, Bannerman," was printed in TRUTH of January 9 last.

At the same time, I should like to congratulate Competitors generally; and in particular to make honourable mention to N. S. W. LANCER, whose anagram, "Tho' it be far, true to England and King did I remain," would have been adjudged the best, but for the fact that the word "and" was not anagrammed.

I shall be glad to receive formal application for Prize from ENTEBBE, with real name and address, in due course.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of LEAF RULE, winner of TRUTH Prize No. 1,452, is Ernest A. Fuller, Esq., 10, The Circus, Greenwich Park, S.E.

 The real name, with the address, of KODON, winner of half the Special Four Guinea Prize awarded in TRUTH Competition No. 1,453, is the Rev. J. A. W. Bell, Westlands, Eastbourne.

 The real name, with the address, of OX SHORT, winner of half the Special Four Guinea Prize awarded in TRUTH Competition No. 1,453, is Percy E. Kingsford, Esq., Oxford Shorthand, Dover.

 The real name, with the address, of EBORACUM, winner of one-quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,454, is the Rev. W. H. de C. Baldwin, Holtby Rectory, York.

 The real name, with the address, of TONY, winner of one-quarter TRUTH Prize No. 1,454, is J. H. Morton, Esq., Ardbeg, Cambuslang.

 The real name, with the addresss, of JEAN QUI RIT, winner of one-quarter of TRUTH Prize No. 1,454, is Chas. Duncan, Esq., 6, Comely Bank Grove, Edinburgh.

CHERRYPICKER.—Your nom-de-plume duly noted. Very pleased to welcome you to our competitions.

TONY.—I am much obliged by your courteous letter. I am inquiring into the points to which you refer. I am quite certain that you are no grumbler; and I can assure you that I am always glad to receive and consider any reasonable expostulation.

I am filing your suggestion for a Puzzle, which may, I think, come in useful in the near future. For the sake of variety, I think it better not to have competitions of this plébiscite character too near to one another; though they are always interesting and popular.

NURSE.—Your first list of Scrapegraces was duly signed with your nom-de-plume; so it would, in any case, have been all right.

LINDITE.—I have made the necessary small correction in your rebus.

STERNE.—I duly note correction in your rebus.

MASTER GUNNER.—I have added the 25/3/07, which was unfortunately omitted by the printers.

JASBERRIE.—The correction of ONELWYN into ONLLWYN has been duly made.

RIMABEL.—I have made the necessary substitution, in accordance with your request.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

THE WORTH OF CLOTHES

The Worth of Clothes is not just the price you pay for them. A suit is worth just so much to you as what you consider the value of what it does towards making you look well-dressed. That—taking into consideration its Wearing quality. Thus, it is possible that a suit for which you paid fifty-five shillings may be worth more than one for which you paid four guineas.

. . . Material does count, but the Work in making it up . . . the careful building up . . . the little taken here and the little given there . . . Master-work—that is what tells—that is what makes a suit worth much. If the Work is good the result is a suit which was plainly made for you with all carefulness . . . a good suit . . . a suit worth more than you pay for it.

. . . Mr. Bult's tailoring makes for the production of clothes of Worth, for its guiding principles are . . . personal work . . . personal supervision . . . careful attention to those details which make for differences . . . the building of a suit instead of the manufacturing of one.

. . . The "BYSTANDER" says: "There are few places where the man of average means can get the same quality, style, and fit in his clothes as at Mr. Bult's."

. . . The following prices will give a good idea of the general charges: Dress Suit (Silk-lined) from 84s.; Frock Coat and Vest from 63s.; Lounge Suit (Tweed, Serge, etc.) from 55s. Patterns, Illustrated Price List (and Self-measurement Form, if desired) will be sent Post Free on application.

No. 1571. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, February 6, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen are to arrive at Buckingham Palace on Saturday evening from Paris, and his Majesty will probably stay in town until he leaves London on his way to Biarritz on Saturday, March 2. It is very likely that the Queen will go to Sandringham on Wednesday next, in which case her Majesty will return to town on Thursday, the 21st. It is expected that the Queen will leave London at the beginning of March on a brief visit to the King and Queen of Denmark at Copenhagen, whence her Majesty will proceed to Christiania, to stay for a short time with the King and Queen of Norway. Princess Victoria, who left London on Saturday with the King and Queen, is to stay at Christiania for several weeks with her sister and brother-in-law.

The King will give two full-dress banquets at Buckingham Palace shortly after the opening of Parliament, and the Ministers, the Ambassadors, and some of the other Chefs de Mission will be invited to the first of these dinners, besides a number of other official personages "of light and leading."

All the Levees of this season are to be held in the Throne Room at St. James's Palace, and the hour will be twelve o'clock, so that the ceremonial is concluded before luncheon. This is a great improvement on the arrangement during the last reign, when the Levees were held at two o'clock, which was a most inconvenient hour, as it interfered with the luncheon arrangements, and practically broke up the whole afternoon. Another laudable reform has been the rule limiting the numbers attending a Levee. Formerly the Palace would be crammed at one Levee, while at the next one the State rooms would be nearly empty. Now there is an adequate attendance at every ceremonial, and the former unpleasant crowding is avoided.

On the day of each Levee the King will drive in state at 11.45 from Buckingham Palace, with an escort of Life Guards, to the garden entrance of St. James's Palace, where his Majesty will be received by the Great Officers of the Household and the other White Staves, who will conduct him to the Royal Closet, where he will be joined by the Prince of Wales and the other members of the Royal family, who will previously have arrived at the Palace. After the customary military formalities, the King will proceed to the Throne Room, followed by the members of the Royal family, and the Levee will at once commence with the presentation (by the Master of the Ceremonies) of the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission, who pass in the order of their precedence. Their Excellencies themselves name any distinguished foreigners or members of suites who are to be presented to his Majesty. After the reception of the Corps Diplomatique the entrée company pass by, and they are followed by the general company.

Only Cabinet Ministers, the Corps Diplomatique, the Keeper of the Privy Purse, the King's private secretary, the Master of the Household, and the other officers who are on duty are to be allowed to remain in the Throne Room after passing the presence, and the State pages are ordered to request all other persons to leave the room at once after they have passed his Majesty. The Ambassadors remain standing on the left of the King next to the Royal family, while the other members of the Corps Diplomatique will take their places in the circle in front of his Majesty.

On the day of a Levee the doors of St. James's Palace are to be opened at half-past eleven. The general company will arrive at the Marlborough Gate entrance, and pass up the Grand Staircase to the State apartments. All personages entitled to the Entrée will arrive at the Ambassadors' Court entrance, and pass through the Banqueting Room and the Entrée Gallery to the Entrée Room, entrance to which sanctuary is guarded by the Groom of the Great Chamber.

It was announced in Truth last week that the King will probably pay a visit to Ireland at Whitsuntide. I hear that if this intended trip comes off, his Majesty will hold a Chapter of the Knights of the Order of St. Patrick at Dublin Castle during his stay at the Viceregal Lodge.

The announcement in several of the papers that the Prince and Princess of Wales have been staying at Frogmore Lodge is incorrect. They were the guests of the King and Queen at the Castle during their stay at Windsor. The Prince and Princess will now make Marlborough House their headquarters until Easter, when they will probably go to Sandringham for the holidays, in which case there is to be a small party at York Cottage for the West Norfolk Hunt Steeplechases.

Princess Henry of Battenberg, who is now at Kensington Palace, is to leave London next week for Madrid, where she will probably stay until about the middle of May. Princess Henry is not expected to return to the Isle of Wight until about the third week in July. When H.R.H. leaves Madrid she will go to Germany, to take a course of waters at Kissingen, and to pay visits to the Grand Duchess Marie of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at the Chateau of Rosenau, and to Princess Louis of Battenberg at Schloss Heiligenberg.

Prince Arthur of Connaught and Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein are to leave London on Friday, the 22nd, for Stockholm, on a visit to Prince and Princess Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden.

The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife and their daughters left Tilbury on Friday in the P. and O. steamer Moldavia for Gibraltar, where they will probably stay for at least two months, and they are not expected to return to England until about the beginning of May.

The Castle season in Dublin began last week with the Levee on Tuesday afternoon. The attendance was very large, including all the high officials in Ireland, civilian and military, and leading personages from many parts of the country. Prince Louis d'Orléans and Braganza and Lord Grenfell, with his staff, were present with the Lord Lieutenant and his household in the Throne room on the occasion. In addition to the two Courts held at the Castle on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, a large dinner and dance were given on Friday and an afternoon party on Saturday. The Viceregal "house party" during the week included Lord and Lady Kenmare, Mr. John and Lady Marjorie Sinclair, Ladies O'Neill, Dorothy Browne, Cicely Browne, Violet Brabazon, Louisa Longley, Lord Shaftesbury, Hon. H. and A. O'Neill, the Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell.

The Irish Sea was in a tempestuous humour last week when Mr. Birrell crossed over to Ireland, the discomfort of the crossing giving, in its own way, an impressive lesson in favour of Home Rule. Mr. Birrell's first day at Dublin Castle was a busy one. He went through the ceremonial of being sworn in as Chief Secretary previous to the Levee, which he subsequently attended in his official capacity. In the evening he made a graceful little after-dinner speech at the Viceregal dinner party. His wielding of the Sword of State was entered on at once, when he bore it into St. Patrick's Hall at the first "Court." The historic weapon, like the sword Excalibur, needs doughty handling; the future still holds the secret of who will be the champion to master it. On the occasion of the second Court, the Chief Secretary having returned to England, Sir Antony MacDonnell bore the Sword of State in his accustomed hands.

The Irish Chief Secretaryship has been held by many distinguished men within the last century, few of whom have been Irish. Lord Carlingford was the last Irishman who held the place, nearly forty years ago. Several Chief Secretaries of Ireland have risen from the mere rule of Ireland to that of the whole kingdom, but they have left the Irish Question as far as ever from being settled. It is a curious thing in connection with the office that no one in Ireland wishes to have an Irishman as Chief Secretary, whilst every one at the same time has a grievance that only a Scotchman or an Englishman is appointed to the place. Under the circumstances the apparently insoluble nature of the Irish Question is perhaps not altogether curious.

Sir Michael Foster was very successful as a teacher of practical physiology, which was his great subject, and he had a brilliant career both at Cambridge and in London. He worked hard and with complete success to develop the Cambridge Biological School. He was an admirable lecturer, and he was fully as effective in the laboratory. Teaching was his strong point, so that he did not write much, but his "Text Book of Physiology" is a very excellent work, which has gone through seven large editions. His interest in science was fully alive until the last. Sir Michael Foster succeeded Lord Avebury as Unionist member for London University in 1900, but he became utterly disgusted with the fuddling policy of the late Government, especially on the education and fiscal questions. He rarely spoke in the House of Commons except on his own subject, and he was listened to with marked attention and respect. He did much good practical work on committees, and he was very popular among all parties in the House.

Mr. David Macbrayne, of Glasgow, who has died at the age of ninety-two, was for many years the sole partner in the well-known shipping firm of Hutcheson's, which was converted into a private company about three years ago. This firm was founded by Messrs. David and Alexander Hutcheson, who rendered an immense service to the west coast of Scotland about sixty years ago by establishing the line of steamers from the Clyde to the Highlands and Hebrides, and they opened up the routes through the Crinan and Caledonian canals. The great and continued prosperity of this firm is understood to have been due in a large measure to the remarkable ability of Mr. Macbrayne as an organiser and administrator. He devoted himself entirely to business, and never took any active part in public affairs, though he did good work as an active member of the Clyde Trust.

The late Mr. Markham Spofforth was appointed a Taxing Master in Chancery in 1876 as a reward for his services in reorganising the Tory Party, of which he was the principal election agent and general wire-puller for more than twenty years. Mr. Spofforth undertook this work at the request of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, and he was mainly instrumental in establishing the Junior Carlton Club, one of the leading principles when this establishment was founded being the admission to membership of as many solicitors as could be induced to join. There had been a great deal of trouble owing to the revolt of many of the old Tory agents after the party split of 1846. New ones were appointed in most constituencies, and Lord Derby entertained the opinion that it was indispensable to attract "the country attorneys and land agents," as Mr. Disraeli wrote.

This year's exhibition of the Royal Agricultural Society is to be held at Lincoln during the last week in June, and it will be visited by the King and the Prince of Wales, and probably by other members of the Royal family. The total value of the prizes offered is £8,366. It was decided at last week's meeting of the Council that next year's show should be held at Newcastle-upon-Tyne during the first week in July. This will be the week after the summer race meeting at Gosforth Park. The last visit of the "Royal" to Newcastle took place in 1887.

The season's bag at Sandringham is understood to have been below the average, owing to various causes. Partridges did not do so well as usual in Norfolk last year, and on several days the Royal chasse was stopped by the stormy weather. The best season at Sandringham was that of 1896-97, when 14,000 pheasants, nearly 4,000 partridges, over 6,000 rabbits, nearly 850 hares, and about 500 head of woodcock, wild duck, teal, and snipe were killed on the King's estates. There will be no more shooting at Sandringham until the beginning of November, and it is understood that the King is not likely to revisit Norfolk until that period.

A correspondent writes:—

An evening paper expresses enthusiastic approval of the discovery (attributed, very absurdly, to Lord Farquhar) that the secret of "the superb success" of woodcock pie has proved to be "the laying of a beefsteak over as well as under the birds, and the placing of the birds themselves with their breasts downwards." This is a venerable principle in the making of partridge and woodcock pies, and it was recommended as the secret of success by the late Mr. Hayward in an essay which appeared in the Quarterly Review some seventy years ago, long before Lord Farquhar was born.

How doth the little Suffragette
  Employ her raucous throat
To shriek for that on which she's set—
  The woman's right to vote?

What frenzied protests doth she make 'Gainst females being taxed
By Parliament, in which to take
  A hand they're never axed!

And let the lady air her rot,
  Say I, till all is blue;
She won't catch me; for I have got
  Some better work to do.

In girlish charms' astute display
  Shall my first years be passed,
That I annex in marriage may
  A husband rich at last.

Can any one tell me what has been the result of the great object-lesson in cheap book publishing which was undertaken last autumn by Mr. Hall Caine and the Daily Mail? I have had requests for information on the subject, but I am unable to supply it, and my own curiosity has been whetted. The experiment was to teach us a great deal, and among other things to show that the publishers were all in the wrong in resisting the philanthropic operations of the Times Book Club. Surely by this time it must either have justified itself or the reverse. It would be a thousand pities if the publication of the result were deferred till the public has forgotten all about the point at issue.

The three volumes of Queen Victoria's letters (1837-61) which have been edited by Lord Esher and Mr. A. C. Benson, will be published by Mr. Murray in October, and not in April, as had been generally expected. The book is to appear simultaneously in London and in New York. A private édition de luxe, in a special and highly ornate binding, is to be produced for the King, who desires to present the work to all the reigning Sovereigns and to a great number of distinguished personages in all parts of the world. It is not generally known that Queen Victoria had a private édition de luxe of her "Journal in the Highlands," largely illustrated, which she kept to give away.

THE MUSIC HALL WAR.

(By a Puzzled Onlooker.)

I met a Manager; he proved
In language very clear and strong—
Which all my lingering doubts removed—
The strikers were absurdly wrong.

I met a Striker; made he plain,
By demonstration ably planned,
The Managers, in this campaign,
Had not a leg on which to stand.

I read the Papers; some this side
They took, and others took they that;
Which so perplexed me by their tide
Of seeming contradictions flat,

That soon this Mantilinic song
Impartially I sang of them:
"Oh, both are right, and neither wrong,
Upon my life and soul, oh, dem!"

A case which came before his Honour Judge Gye the other day throws some interesting light on the way in which church schools are apt to be managed, besides having an incidental bearing on the administrative methods of certain Roman Catholic bishops. In February last St. John's Roman Catholic School at Gosport was summarily closed by the managers at a few hours' notice. The assistant teachers received no salary in lieu of notice, and as some of them lived in Ireland they were consequently placed in such difficulty that a charity concert was got up in order to help them to get home. One of them, Miss Sheehan, sued the foundation managers, Canon Watson and three other gentlemen, for £4 as salary instead of notice, and the County Court Judge found in her favour, with costs.

It appeared in the course of the proceedings that the closing of the school resulted from some quarrel between the managers and the head-mistress. The full facts were not clearly disclosed, but the dispute seems to have been of a most trumpery character. The principal circumstance mentioned was that some lady had given sashes for the children to wear, and that the head-mistress had objected to distribute them, on the ground that there were not enough to go round. Apparently there were other matters in dispute, for no less than twelve charges were made against the head-mistress, but they were all dismissed after investigation—counsel said by the managers, but I presume that it was by the Education Committee. After this, it would seem that the managers summarily closed the school as the simplest way of signifying their displeasure with their head-mistress. They actually paid that lady £17 in lieu of notice, but they left the assistant teachers to shift for themselves in the way above described. Possibly they had not the money to pay them, but that does not make their conduct any better, nor justify their repudiation of legal liability.

The Bishop of Portsmouth is the legal owner of the school in question, and Canon Watson in his evidence said that when he came to the school and notified that it was to be closed, he was acting as the Bishop's representative. It must be assumed that he did not take this step without Bishop Cahill's approval. It seems to me that those who subscribe for the support of such a school may well expect from the Bishop some explanation of the closing of the establishment with so little regard for the interests of the children and the just rights of the teachers. I published a letter last week in which a Roman Catholic observed that before responding to the appeal of the Archbishop of Westminster for £100,000 for the maintenance of Catholic schools, he and others would like to see the management of diocesan funds placed on a footing more satisfactory to the laity; and in view of this example of the high-handed proceedings of Dr. Bourne's "revered friend," Bishop Cahill, in regard to his diocesan schools, I should think that this feeling will extend itself to the diocese of Portsmouth. To me, as an outsider, the reflection which is chiefly suggested by this case is the anomalous absurdity of calling a school which is dealt with in this arbitrary way at a moment's notice by the decree of a bishop a "public elementary school," and providing for its maintenance, when the bishop chooses to keep the doors open, out of public money.

Another queer example of church school management has been noticed in the Lincolnshire papers. In this case the school concerned is a Church of England school in the village of Grainthorpe, in Lincolnshire. It seems that shortly before Christmas some dispute arose among the managers as to what Christmas holidays should be given, with the result that they could not come to any decision as to whether any should be given at all. The children, no doubt under the direction of their parents, took French leave, and stayed away during Christmas week; but the teachers, being bound by their agreements, could not do this, and had to go through the farce of going to the school every day while the children were away. The head-teacher was placed in a painful dilemma, because he could not mark the attendances in the register and make it appear that the whole of the children were absent, without reducing the average attendance and the Government grant, besides possibly exposing the parents to unpleasing attentions from the attendance officer; and on the other hand he could not mark this period as a holiday, because no holiday had been officially granted, and he might get into trouble with the managers if he took upon himself to declare one. He applied in vain to the managers for instructions, and according to the latest information this august body was to meet shortly to once more debate the question whether the school should or should not have a holiday last Christmas. This, again, is a "public elementary school," supported by public money, and, by the theory of an Act of Parliament, subject to public control!

Canon Appleton has been elected Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge, in the place of Dr. Kirkpatrick, who has been promoted to the Deanery of Ely, where he succeeds the new Bishop of Truro. Canon Appleton, who had a most distinguished career at Cambridge, has been a Fellow of Trinity College since 1874, and he was for many years a very successful tutor there, and held several important College offices. He left Cambridge in 1894 to become Vicar of St. George's, Camberwell, and Warden of the Trinity College Mission, and in 1904 he was presented by his College to the vicarage of Ware. He is an able administrator and a brilliant scholar, and his appointment to the headship of Selwyn meets with hearty approval at Cambridge. Canon Appleton has been examining chaplain to three successive Bishops of Durham—Lightfoot, Westcott, and Moule.

The Provost and Fellows of Oriel College have presented the Rev. Stephen Cornish, Rector of Quedgeley, Gloucestershire, to the rectory of Ufton Nervet, Berkshire. The living, which has become vacant by the death of Canon Cornish, has been held by many highly distinguished Oriel men, notably James Fraser, who was promoted by Mr. Gladstone from this benefice to the See of Manchester in 1870.

Canon F. J. Holland, who has died suddenly at Sorrento, was a younger brother of Lord Knutsford. He was beneficed at Canterbury from 1853 until 1861, when he became incumbent of Quebec Chapel, then a crowded place of worship with a fashionable and wealthy congregation. Canon Holland was an eloquent and persuasive preacher, his sermons being guided by the judgment and taste of a highly cultivated scholar. He detested sensationalism of any kind, but he was a thoroughly earnest man, and his whole life was an example of hearty devotion to every public and private duty. The ritual which he introduced at Quebec Chapel would now be regarded as commonplace, if not meagre, but in 1861 it was considered decidedly advanced.

Canon Holland was warmly interested in education, and his great work was the establishment of the Church of England High School for Girls, to which he devoted much time and considerable sums of money. He also took an active part in school management at Canterbury. He was appointed one of the six preachers of Canterbury Cathedral in 1859 by Archbishop Sumner, and in 1882 he was advanced to a residentiary stall, so that he had been closely connected with the Cathedral for nearly forty-eight years. He will be much missed at Canterbury, where he had long been a familiar figure; and he was greatly esteemed and beloved, as his kindly and genial manner and his munificent benevolence had made him very popular among all classes. He inherited the love of travelling for which his father (Sir Henry Holland) was so well known, and had visited every part of Europe, the West Indies, North Africa, Turkey, and Palestine.

It has been stated that Canon Holland was appointed to his stall at Canterbury by Archbishop Tait. This is wrong, for the appointment was made by Mr. Gladstone. Canon Holland had made Canterbury his principal residence for many years past, and, in addition to his prebendal house in the Precincts, he rented a charming country place at Harbledown. The canonry, which is in the gift of the Archbishop for this turn, is now understood to be worth about £600 a year, with residence. The stipend was formerly £1,000 a year, but the revenue of the Chapter has been largely reduced by agricultural depression, and some years ago it was said that the value of a stall there had fallen to about £350 a year, but there has since been an improvement.

Canon Duncan, who died last week after only a few hours' illness, was one of the best-known and most esteemed ecclesiastics in the diocese of Salisbury, where he had been working for over half a century, his whole clerical life having been spent in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire. Canon Duncan was presented to the important living of Calne by Bishop Hamilton in 1865, and he had since worked that important parish with conspicuous zeal and ability. He was not only an excellent clergyman, but he was warmly interested in educational and charitable work, and took a leading part in the social life of the town.

It must have been edifying to hear the discussion by the City Fathers last week on the Bishop of London's suggestion that the parish of St. Margaret Pattens should be united with another parish, so that the income of the former benefice may be liberated for use where it is more needed. The living of St. Margaret Pattens, which has lately become vacant, is in the gift of the Common Council. Its value is £750 gross, with a house. The parishioners number 178. Clearly the appointment of another Rector at £750 a year to minister to such of the 178 parishioners as are Churchmen would be a scandal. Probably the City Fathers were not unconscious of this—at any rate they studiously avoided any reference to that aspect of the question. What they did was to make a show of indignation over an imaginary proposal for the destruction of an ancient church, a building full of historical interest and noted for its architectural beauty. Its removal would be an act of vandalism—and so on and so forth.

What humbug this is! If the church is such a glory of the City, by all means let the City keep it. But there is no reason why the preservation of the church itself should involve the continued payment of a stipend of £750 a year to the Rector for doing practically nothing—no reason, that is, except the desire of the Common Council to retain a nice piece of patronage. It was this desire which was at the bottom of the rejection by a large majority of the Bishop's suggestion. Not half a dozen of the Common Councillors would care a brass farthing about the retention of the church if there were not a good income attached to it.

Truth is not a paper in which theological opinions are discussed, nor am I addicted to airing my own religious convictions publicly. Far, therefore, be it from me to express my own as to the so-called "new theology" of the Rev. R. J. Campbell. There is, of course, nothing new about it, but it is so entirely at variance with what I had supposed was the belief, not only of Anglicans, but of the great body of Nonconformists, that I am surprised that more of their authorised representatives have not pronounced against it. So far as I understand Mr. Campbell, he entirely throws over the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ as generally received by Christians. He teaches that Christ was a man like all of us. He was an exceptionally good man, but there was no supernatural interference in His birth, or in what befell Him. He preached a system of ethics even purer than those of Socrates, Buddha and Zoroaster. Such preaching was sure, at that time and place, to end in His violent death. He did not seek to evade the consequences, and His life and death have produced a moral effect, because of the purity of the former and the self-sacrifice involved in the latter. Thus He lifted man from barbarism and selfishness into the spirit of brotherhood. The only salvation is in being like Him, and the only way to be like Him is to have faith in Him, and to show this faith by living in the spirit in which He lived and died. The Bible is in no way inspired. The details of the story and words of Christ as set forth in the Gospels may or may not be correct, and St. Paul in his Epistles was sometimes right and sometimes wrong.

Mr. Campbell, although disclaiming all the vagueness, as well as the dogmatism, of theologians, seems by no means clear himself as to what he believes and what he does not. I have read the reports of several of his discourses, but I do not gather whether he believes in a personal Deity, or in a future state. If he is convinced of the latter, he does not distinctly say so, nor does he explain on what grounds he entertains this conviction. The "new theology" appears therefore to be entirely at variance with what, up to now, has been deemed Christianity by all sects of Christians that have existed for the last eighteen hundred years, and by all the Fathers of the Christian Church whose writings have come down to us. I am not saying that they have not all been in error, and that Mr. Campbell is not in the right. What, however, I should like to know is how far existing sects of Christians agree with him, or, if they do not agree with him, whether they regard the differences between him and them as so unimportant that they can still consider him a Christian. If they do, they must up to now have been misunderstood.

Messrs. Little and Whittingham, of Stroud, solicitors to Mr. Broderip, have sent me a copy of a letter which they have addressed to the Somerset County Gazette in reference to the extraordinary dispute between their client and the rector and churchwardens of Cossington concerning the parish churchyard. The letter is of considerable length, but it is only necessary for me to notice such portions of it as traverse statements in my paragraphs on the subject a fortnight ago. As I explained, Mr. Broderip's residence, the Manor House, abuts on to one side of the churchyard, which on the other sides is surrounded by his garden, the only public approach to the churchyard and church being by a narrow footpath. It was asserted (1) that the churchyard was unfenced; and (2) that the part of it nearest to the house was laid out as though it belonged to the garden. As to the first point, the solicitors say that there is "a wire fence marking the boundaries of the churchyard." The fact appears to be, however, that this so-called fence consists of a single strand of wire a few inches from the ground. It is not a fence at all in the common acceptation of the word, and the diocesan authorities, taking this view, ordered the erection of a proper fence, which amongst other things would keep animals from straying on to the consecrated ground. With regard to the second point, the solicitors write that it is not true that part of the churchyard has been laid out as a garden. "It is plain turf, kept mown and tidy. A flower border against the kitchen garden wall has been in existence for quite sixty-five years." To this the rector and churchwardens make the retort that the part in question has been made use of for garden parties.

Another allegation (3) was that a bow window of the house and a flight of steps constituted an encroachment on the churchyard; also that a portion of the churchyard had been taken into Mr. Broderip's carriage drive, but had lately been restored. The latter statement is not touched upon by the solicitors, who, after affirming generally that there have been "no encroachments," go on to say that the bow window has been there for sixty-five years, and the steps for forty years. It was stated (4) that Mr. Broderip had prohibited burials on the side of the churchyard nearest to his house. "As a matter of courtesy," his solicitors remark, "the sexton has sometimes consulted Mr. Broderip as to the position of graves with regard to his house." The only remaining question—but the most important of all so far as the comments I made are concerned—is the question of the lease of the churchyard. On this Messrs. Little and Whittingham write:—

> It has been customary for Mr. Broderip and his predecessors, as patrons of the living, to always have a lease of the churchyard from each rector. The object of the lease was to enable them to keep the churchyard in good order by mowing the grass and otherwise. As a matter of fact, the churchyard is kept in excellent order.

This seems to me a very feeble and unconvincing defence of the singular arrangement which—quite illegally, it is now believed—made Mr. Broderip lessee of the churchyard. The keeping of the churchyard in good order is, of course, a highly laudable object; but obviously it is the duty of the rector and churchwardens to do this. Who ever heard before of a churchyard being leased for this or any other purpose to one of the parishioners? Besides, if this was the sole object, why did Mr. Broderip threaten the rector and churchwardens with an action for damages if they put up a fence round the churchyard in accordance with the requirements of the diocesan authorities? This threat was explicitly based upon his assumed "rights" under the lease. Clearly the rector and churchwardens would be betraying their trust if they submitted to any such interference in the exercise of their duty, nor are they relieved of their obligations in the matter by the fact that they are not supported by the majority of the parishioners. Mr. Broderip is the principal landowner, and in a place like Cossington people are very reluctant to appear in opposition to the "squire." It is for this reason that the rector and churchwardens have had to appeal outside the parish for the money required for the fencing of the churchyard.

A lady sends me a bulky docket of correspondence illustrating once again the swindle carried on by the individual who calls himself the Imperial Art Supply Company. As will be seen on reference to the Truth Cautionary List, published this week, this individual has lately removed from Great James-street to Chichester House, Chancery-lane, but he still keeps his suburban address at 17, Ranelagh-avenue, Fulham. The lady in question paid her 7s. 6d. for the "outfit" necessary for colouring prints for which the Imperial Art Supply Company promised to pay her, having, like all the other victims, been previously assured on the strength of a sample of her work that the firm were satisfied that she would be able to do it. The following extracts from the letters received when she went to work show exactly how the trick is played, and how little disguise there is about it:—

November 15. Madam, We can see an improvement in your work, but the flesh tint is dirty-looking, and the hair is a little too vivid. The colour on drapery is hardly rich enough, otherwise your work is satisfactory. . . . .

December 3.—Madam,—We can see an improvement in your work, but the flesh tint is rather dirty-looking, and the hair is hardly rich enough. The colour on drapery is unevenly applied, and is also a trifle too vivid. We trust you will be able to remedy these little defects. . . . .

December 18. Madam, Your work shows a decided improvement, but the flesh tint is rather too deep. The drapery is also a little unevenly coloured. . . . .

January 8. Madam,—The flesh tint is rather dirty-looking. The blue on drapery is rather heavy, and the brown is unevenly applied. Otherwise we can see a great improvement in your work. . . . .

These letters, of course, are written by hundreds to the victims of the swindle, and continue to be written as long as the victim chooses to persevere in the attempt to earn a few pence from these swindlers. The parties who are really responsible for the continual robbery of ladies of limited means by such tricks are the newspapers which publish the advertisement. In the above case the victim states that she saw the advertisement in "a well-known Church paper." If I had the making of our laws, the "well-known Church paper" would be compelled to compensate her for the money and labour she has wasted.

I have to acknowledge £3 from "Ello," to be devoted to a fund for the homeless and destitute.

The Ritz Hotel, Piccadilly, W. — 8090 Gerrard. The Restaurant and Hotel overlook the Green Park. Magnificent suite of Ball and Banqueting Rooms. Under the same Direction as the Carlton Hotel.

An order is in force in a Scottish regiment now in India excluding from the A.T.A. room all who are not members of the Association. I suppose that the commanding officer thinks that if men want to use the room they will join the Association, but it may equally well be argued that they are more likely to be induced to do so by frequenting the room and associating with abstainers. Up to the present, at any rate, the order does not seem to have advanced the Temperance movement materially, for I am told that as the result of the New Year's Day celebrations nearly half the men of the companies on the station had to be very severely dealt with. It might be as well, I should think, to try now the effect of encouraging the men to frequent the Army Temperance room, instead of keeping them sober by terms of imprisonment.

In the latest growl from that melancholy spot, Aden, I hear that the number of guards mounted by the artillery has recently increased from two to six daily, without any visible reason; and that the amount of such duty now imposed is far in excess of the general rule either at home or in India. It is alleged that the gunners get more than their fair share of such work, but however that may be, it is evident that they have not derived much benefit from the supposed abolition of unnecessary guards.

During January a number of petty officers and men in Devonport barracks, who have been dissatisfied with the quantity of meat issued to them, arranged to take it direct from the block when issued and have it weighed privately. I have now some of the results before me. The weight seems to have proved deficient in nearly every case where it was thus tested. 8 lb. of beef issued to the stokers' mess came out at 6 lb. 8 oz., and in another case at 7 lb. 1 oz. The same quantity issued to the seamen's mess came out at 6 lb. 5 oz. On another occasion 10 lb. issued to the seamen's mess was found to weigh 8 lb. 6 oz., and so on.

I by no means accept these figures as conclusive; in weighing goods the "personal equation" sometimes comes into calculation as well as the weights and scales themselves; but we must allow for the bias of the weigher on both sides, and if the truth in this case only lies half-way between the two sets of figures, the fact remains that the men do not get what they are supposed to get, and that somebody is making an illicit profit at their expense. The same thing is bound to occur in all issues of provisions—e.g., tea, sugar, and tobacco—unless the weighing is checked on behalf of those who are interested in its being correct. I do not know enough of the circumstances to suggest exactly how a satisfactory system of checking could be introduced, but those who do know the circumstances ought to be able to invent such a system without difficulty.

Possibly some one may say that it is impossible in weighing out so many pounds of beef to be correct to an ounce. Even if that be true, it is no reason why the discrepancy should always be on one side, as it appears to be in the present case. If exact measurement is impracticable, the balance should be adjusted by striking an average, not by always measuring on the wrong side. We see much the same thing in the business of retailing beer at army canteens. It is assumed that exact measurement is impossible; short measure is, therefore, always served, and the man in charge is required to produce a surplus above the quantity nominally sold as shown by the cash receipts. It is evident, from the above figures, that the parties responsible for weighing out provisions to naval messes ought also to be charged with a very considerable surplus.

I am told that the discrepancy between the nominal and the real measure is notoriously biggest in the issue of rum. Here we have the case of army beer exactly reproduced. Somebody must make a profit on the short measure issued. I do not know who it may be, but I would bet heavily that it is not the British taxpayer. From the taxpayer's point of view the men ought to get all the food and drink that the country pays for on their behalf. No difficulty about exactly measuring out small quantities in the least prevents this being done. If the desired result cannot be arrived at by the law of averages, whatever "savings" are effected in the process of measuring ought to be handed over to the men in kind or in cash.

While on this subject, I would call the attention of the Committee on Naval Canteens to a circular from a firm of Maltese bumboatmen reproduced in facsimile in the current number of the Fleet. The circular was distributed among the ship's company on the commissioning of H.M.S. Hibernia at Devonport, and the Fleet states that it was the last effort made to capture the ship after "three of the most notorious bumboatmen" had been for several days "competing in bribes" to secure the canteen contract. Here are a few extracts from the document:—

> Our terms are unequalled for best goods supplied at 5 per cent. discount. . . . We are born in the business and know better your wants, the old Hibernia was one of our first instalation of canteen being Irish named ship. In addition to the proposed terms we should like to commemorate St. Patrick's Day, 17th March, by allowing free dinner, not exceeding 2s. 6d. Our prices are to be those lowest quoted by other competing firms and so much each man monthly. . . .

Everybody can see at a glance that a competition among contractors to secure business by such efforts as this must be altogether mischievous, whether from the point of view of the men concerned or anybody else, and the system which gives rise to such results must be radically wrong. The committee now at work cannot have much difficulty in improving upon it, and I still think that the proposal that all canteen contracts should be under the control of an Admiralty official is the best for that purpose.

It is rather surprising to learn that Skegness, now a fairly well-known seaside resort, with a permanent population of over 3,000, increased in the summer months to 20,000, has no police-court. A local correspondent gives me this information. The absence of a police-court, however, is not due to the immaculate virtue of Skegness, but to the simple fact that cases arising there are tried by magistrates sitting at Spilsby, thirteen miles away. There is not even a resident magistrate in Skegness, the nearest being at Wainfleet, five miles distant. Nor is this the only matter in which the town is peculiarly ill-served, for the chairman of the District Council lives at Derby, the clerk at Lincoln, the treasurer at Gainsborough, the school attendance officer at Spilsby, the relieving officer at Alford, and the registrar of births and deaths at Burgh! This official absenteeism is scarcely flattering to Skegness—indeed, it almost suggests that Skegness is a nice place to live out of.

TO THE BACILLUS PYÆMICUS.

Pyæmic Bacillus, you microbe infernal,
Who sneak your way into our systems internal,
  Though no one can tell how the deuce you get in;
By a pin-prick, it may be, by scratch or erosion,
Or just by a thin place, that nobody knows on,
  In the cuticle—medical term for the skin.

And when you are in, O you microbe capricious,
No saying there is where you'll settle to dish us,
  Or where to commence operations you'll plan.
That depends, it would seem, on your whim of the second;
But this, at least, certain and sure may be reckoned,
  That, where you do settle, you play the Old Man.

The judgment which Mr. Justice Kekewich delivered last week in the case of Taverner v. Cuff is of considerable interest at the present moment in view of the fact that Mr. William Taverner, the plaintiff in the action, is still making the most energetic efforts to keep alive the "National Old Age Pension Trust," which he started some three years ago in connection with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society. Many of my readers will doubtless remember this crazy scheme, and the pig-headed obstinacy with which Mr. Taverner clung to it in spite of the clearest demonstration of its financial rottenness. On the application of his co-trustees the Court ordered his scheme to be wound up. Taverner offered every obstacle in his power to this being done, and persisted in representing that his scheme was still alive, and inviting fools to subscribe to it, using for the purpose the name of the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society, of which he was the secretary.

When the trustees of the Sermon Society endeavoured to check his proceedings, Taverner brought an action against them, the action above mentioned. The action was referred to an arbitrator, and the arbitrator decided against Taverner on practically all points. Taverner then moved to set aside the award. This motion Mr. Justice Kekewich dismissed last week. In dismissing it he made the following observations:—

> The arbitration was heard at great length, and his Lordship could well understand, after seeing Mr. Taverner in the witness-box, that the arbitrator had a very troublesome duty to perform.

When the plaintiff was asked a question he responded by making a long speech. His evidence was full of inaccuracies, and was hopelessly untrustworthy.

Having had the opportunity of seeing Mr. Taverner at this office in defence of his Old Age Pension Trust, I can myself well understand his Lordship's observations.

Now, the important point is that this person is still fighting tooth and nail to keep his Old Age Pension scheme on foot, and to obtain subscriptions for it with the assistance of the name of the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society. The Daily News mentioned last week that it had information of his proceedings from Wiltshire. I have myself had inquiries on the subject from Derbyshire. They come in consequence of an article which appeared in the Derby Express of January 26, under the attractive heading "Old Age Pensions—Formation of a National Trust." The article stated that the National Old Age Pension Trust was established in July, 1904, and legally constituted in December, 1906, and it went on to give particulars of the scheme and to refer inquirers to the "Controller," at Greenhithe. It also mentioned that "the founder is Mr. William Taverner, of the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society," and that the reports showed that 15,000 persons were already enrolled.

One of my correspondents, in forwarding a copy of this article, suggests that it is an advertisement. I do not know that there is any reason to suppose that, but it does not matter much whether the notice is published on the usual advertising terms, or as a bonâ-fide editorial pronouncement put forth in pure ignorance or carelessness. The effect is the same either way. The material points are that, although the National Old Age Pension Trust has been wound up by an order of the High Court, Taverner has simply formed another under the same name, and represents it as the National Old Age Pension Trust which he founded in 1904; that the scheme is essentially the same as that of the original trust; and that Mr. Taverner still seeks to commend it to public support, especially among Nonconformists, by associating it, through his own name, with the Spurgeon Memorial Sermon Society, which has done everything in its power to stop his proceedings. It is most deplorable that provincial newspapers, or any others, should further this unscrupulous individual in his mischievous designs by advertising his scheme, whether for love or money; and as it may be supposed that many other papers besides the one above mentioned are being used by him for this purpose, they are much to blame if they place their columns at his disposal without first ascertaining the full facts.

Lookers on do not always see most of the game, but I confess that I do not think I should have found for the defendants had I been on the jury in Monckton v. Dunn. It seems to me that any lady is entitled to protection against having pictures of herself in any sort of attitude or costume, or no costume at all, faked up by an enterprising tradesman and sold for his own profit. In the present case the principal defence, so far as I can make out, was that Miss Gertie Millar has been photographed with her consent in all sorts of costumes and attitudes. But that only means that she is an actress, and that, like others of her profession, she has to be photographed in character for business purposes.

Are we, then, to hold that an actress is less entitled than any other lady to protection against being publicly represented in a picture in a manner which is offensive to her? I suppose a jury would hardly go so far as that, and that in Mrs. Monckton's case the jury were influenced by the suggestion that she did not really object to the pictures in question, but was instigated to do so by other parties for trade purposes. But that seems rather unfair, and as the verdict was not given on that express ground the case remains a dangerous precedent, for it will certainly have the effect of encouraging enterprising tradesmen to take these liberties, and with other people than actresses, and of discouraging parties who are thus outraged from seeking the protection of the law.

At the same time, it must be admitted that libels quite as atrocious as any that could be perpetrated by a "fake" photographer are published every day in the shape of bonâ-fide portraits. In connection with this very case there was a picture of Miss Gertie Millar in the Daily Graphic, for which I should think she might have hoped to recover heavier damages than even a sympathetic jury would have been likely to award against Messrs. Dunn and Co.; and I am of opinion that Mr. Justice Darling might have been joined in the action with every prospect of success. The weekly illustrated papers are sometimes not over kind to their victims, but the dailies have simply added a new terror to existence.

FAKED PHOTOS.

I thought it hard her face they matched
With form suggesting too much leg;
I thought it hard they showed her hatched
Just lately from an Easter Egg.

I thought it hard they stuck her head
Upon a trunk in nightdress clad;
And yet—so judge and jury said—
No legal remedy she had.

If that's the Law, I'm much afraid
That I, one day, my face may find
On someone else's frame displayed,
Clad only in a—never mind—

Or, even worse, in nothing dight
(For where the limit can you draw?)
And yet I'll not have any right
To stop their game—if that's the Law.

As the Daily Mail discovered on Monday morning, no one has a right to prejudge the questions raised by the charge of perjury against Millie Marsh. I should be the last to do so. It may be that in the course of her numerous confessions this young woman has told the truth, and that Lewis was unjustly convicted on her evidence; it may be that her evidence against him was true, and her subsequent confessions the result of hallucination or some other cause. But however that may be, it is quite evident that any Home Secretary who summarily released a convict merely on the strength of a servant-girl's confession of perjury, in the face of all the other incriminating circumstances against the prisoner, would be quite unfit for his position; and that the attempt of a newspaper to force him into such a course by vilifying him in print and in pictures is an unwarrantable abuse of the power of the press. If, as seems far from improbable, it should bring its own punishment, no one need be sorry.

This indecent personal attack on Mr. Gladstone may, however, have a useful effect. It exemplifies in the most conspicuous manner the evils that result from the present jurisdiction of the Home Office in criminal cases, and it ought to bring home to the mind of the present Home Secretary the urgent need of amending the system. It is the inevitable result of the lack of any court of criminal appeal that every case of alleged wrongful conviction leads to newspaper agitation. It is highly probable that, the Home Secretary being a Cabinet Minister, newspaper agitation on behalf of a prisoner will be inflamed by party spirit, and it thus easily degenerates into rancorous personal attack.

A more scandalous and futile method than this of furthering the ends of justice cannot be conceived. The prisoner necessarily suffers from it more than anybody else, because his case, however just, is liable to be discredited by the violence of his own champions, and even if they are moderate and reasonable in their arguments, they may be suspected by the Minister of being actuated by party motives; while for the same reasons that section of the press which is on the side of Ministers either holds aloof or resists the demand for justice.

Next to the prisoner the Home Secretary himself is most to be pitied. His task is always a difficult and invidious one in these cases. Unless he is an experienced lawyer he is bound to defer to the judgment of the official staff to which such matters are assigned, yet for the purpose of public discussion he must accept the decision and whatever criticism it provokes as if it were his personal act. Every Home Secretary that I can remember has expressed at one time or another his dislike of this business, yet none will interest himself in relieving the Home Office of it. If, therefore, in the present instance, the Home Secretary has been assailed with a violence and unreason beyond all precedent, one may hope that it may do something to goad him into the only action by which such annoyances can be avoided.

The Mayor of Bury St. Edmunds and his colleagues of the Borough Bench were amazingly lenient the other day in the case of a woman named Barton, who was charged with neglecting her four children. Medical and other evidence showed that the children were kept in a horribly dirty state and looked badly nourished. The doctor said that they were neglected in a manner which was very likely to be injurious to their health, and an inspector of the N.S.P.C.C. deposed that during the past eighteen months he had repeatedly warned the defendant, but without any effect. After remarking that these statements were very serious, the magistrates informed the defendant that the summons would be dismissed, but that she must remember that the case would still be watched by the N.S.P.C.C. Not for a moment do I wish to suggest that the woman should have been severely punished on this occasion, but considering the seriousness of the offence and the period for which it had continued, in spite of the warnings of the inspector, the absolute dismissal of the summons was a most extraordinary proceeding. The Bench might very well have adjourned the case for a time to see whether the defendant's conduct improved. To let her off at once without any penalty and without any guarantee whatever for her future behaviour towards her suffering little children was practically a miscarriage of justice, and such a decision is obviously calculated to render more difficult the work of the N.S.P.C.C. in dealing with similarly negligent parents.

A correspondent calls attention to a case at Saltash Petty Sessions last week in which six young fellows were charged with trespassing in pursuit of game, or aiding and abetting in the offence. It seemed that one of them named Thorn invited the others to go rabbiting with him on his grandmother's land, but took them on to the adjoining farm, where they were all trespassers. Thorn admitted his offence and corroborated the statements of the rest of the defendants, that they had no knowledge of the boundaries of the farms, and were quite unaware that they were trespassing. The Bench appeared to think that this was true, the Chairman saying that they believed the other defendants were led away by Thorn. His worship added, however, that "they were responsible for their own actions," and, in addition to Thorn himself, all his companions were convicted and fined. The penalties were small, but conviction involves a stigma, and the Saltash Shallows might surely have dismissed the summons against the five youthful defendants, whose offence—if it can be called an offence at all—was committed unwittingly.

Recently, I pilloried the Chichester City Shallows on account of a monstrously severe sentence of four months' imprisonment which they passed upon a youth of sixteen—a first offender—for theft. I now hear that the matter came under the notice of the Home Secretary, with the result that the sentence has been reduced by one-half. It seems to me that the defendant might very well have been let off altogether under the provisions of the First Offenders Act, but it is at any rate satisfactory to know that he will not have to suffer the full measure of the Draconic punishment which the Chichester Bench meted out to him, and I hope yet to learn that the Lord Chancellor has given effect to another of my comments on the case—namely, that the magistrates responsible for the sentence should be relieved of duties which they are manifestly unfitted to discharge.

For years past the Bailies who dispense vicarious justice from the Bench at Kirkcaldy Police Court have figured in my Legal Pillory, particularly in respect of the leniency with which they treat the brutal ruffians who consider a wife to be a sort of football or punching-ball upon which to develop their muscular powers. This week an object-lesson in the futility of inflicting a paltry fine for such offences is supplied in the case mentioned below, where a man who was fined on the preceding week came before Bailie Gray on another charge. On the first occasion the wife paid the fine, and the man immediately returned home and committed another brutal assault upon his unfortunate wife. Yet even this lesson was lost upon the fatuous Bailie, for he merely inflicted another fine upon the man. An interesting comparison as to the way English county justices treat the motorist who exceeds the speed limit and the man who drives a horse furiously is also to be seen in the cases from Arundel and Woodbury respectively.

Stratford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Andrew Johnston, A. Lister Harrison, and C. G. Musgrave. George Want, charged with assaulting Edgar Dench by striking him on the nose with a quart pewter pot. Fined 20s. and costs.

Nottingham Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. T. Gascoigne and A. Brownsword. Robert Belsham, charged with assaulting a woman. He struck her several violent blows about the head and body. Fined 20s.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Gray. Henry Cluny, charged with assaulting his wife. He knocked her down, beat her with his fists, and dragged her about. He had been fined the previous week for a similar assault, and after his wife had paid the fine he went home and assaulted her again. Fined 30s.

Upper Rhondda Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. F. R. Madge, charged with an aggravated assault upon his wife. He struck her three times on the eye and on the chest with his fist. Fined £2.

King's Heath Police-court. Before Messrs. Buller, Tomson, and J. C. Lane. J. T. Wilson, charged with assaulting his wife. He kicked her violently. The magistrates considered it a bad case and fined him 40s. and costs.

Godalming Petty Sessions. Fred. Nunn, charged with ill-treating a horse by starving it. The manger was licked perfectly clean and a portion of it eaten away. The animal was in a deplorable condition, and could hardly stand. Fined £1.

Coventry County Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. T. R. Vickers, W. Johnson, M.P., E. Wooton, and Earl Craven. Mary Jane Thomas, charged with neglecting her eleven-year-old boy. His clothing was in a most foul and verminous condition, and he was covered from head to foot with vermin bites. Fined £1, or in default 14 days' hard labour.

Stratford Petty Sessions. Before the same magistrates. Robert Curtis, a grocer's assistant, charged with stealing 2d., the money of his employers. Fined 40s. and costs, or a month's imprisonment.

Nottingham Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. Johnson and E. Thornloe. Olive Smith, charged with stealing a pair of lady's boots. One month's imprisonment.

Mold Petty Sessions. Before Major Phillips, Colonel Lloyd, and Mr. E. Wheldon. D. Powell and T. Clark, charged with sleeping out. Seven days each.

Fareham Petty Sessions. P. Lipscombe, charged with night-poaching. He had two pheasants and a gun on him. One month's imprisonment, and bound over for a year.

Arundel County Petty Sessions. Before Captain Kemp and other magistrates. James Walters, charged with stealing seven picture cards, value 10d. Fourteen days' hard labour.

Romford Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Matthews and Captain Stone. M. Curley and W. Potter, charged with stealing a pump, value 20s. Two months' hard labour each.

East Dereham Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. Bulwer, Copeman, Daniel, and Hervey. Henry Wright, labourer, charged with stealing wood value 6d. Fourteen days' hard labour.

Mansfield Borough Petty Sessions. Before Alderman J. E. Alcock, Alderman W. Singleton, and Mr. M. G. Bradley. Thompson Hibbert, a youth, charged with stealing two pairs of boots, value 9s. 10d., from outside a shop doorway. The magistrates, after commenting on the temptation tradesmen put in the way of persons like prisoner, sentenced him to two months' hard labour.

Dunfermline Police-court. Before Bailie Stewart. William Clark, charged with assaulting his wife by striking her several times in the face with his fists. Fined £1.

Sparkhill Police court. Before Messrs. J. Boston, J. W. Simcox, J. Hughes, S. Johnson, and J. Marriott. W. F. Wright, charged with assaulting his wife. He caught her by the throat with one hand and struck her in the face with the other, afterwards turning her out of doors. Fined 20s. and costs.

Woodbury Petty Sessions. Edwin Retter and Walter Pring, farmers, of Newton Poppleford, charged with furiously driving at Sowton. They were galloping at a rate estimated at 14 miles an hour, and apparently were racing. Fined 1s. and 3s. 6d. costs each.

Teignmouth Petty Sessions. Before Captain Paul and Mr. R. Alsop. G. H. Rooke, charged with stealing a bowl from a farm. Three months' hard labour.

Spalding Police-court. Before Messrs. F. Howard, W. H. Mills, W. J. Thompson, W. J. Hardy, and Dr. H. T. Stiles. H. Mays, charged with stealing a timepiece value 5s. Three months' hard labour.

Edward Darlow, charged with stealing 15 hens' eggs belonging to his employer. Fourteen days' hard labour.

Arundel County Petty Sessions. Before Sir Henry Aubrey-Fletcher, Captain Hills, Messrs. E. J. Mostyn, Travers, and Rawson-Shaw. F. Parker Squibb, charged with exceeding the speed limit on a motor-car and with failing to produce his licence. Fined £6 12s. on the first charge, and £1 6s. on the second.

Stockport Police-court.—George Taylor, charged with assaulting James R. Ryding, licensee of a hotel, and a police constable. Being refused drink, he knocked Ryding down, kicked him, and tore his jacket to pieces. He also struck and kicked the constable. Fined 25s. and costs.

CLARK LIBRARY Randle Cartwright LOWELL, MASS.

Mr. Justice Ridley passed, at Norfolk Assizes the other day, a sentence which stands out in striking contrast to a decision of the Sheffield J.P.s, upon which I commented last week. At Sheffield the secretary of a friendly society, charged with misappropriating over £300 of the funds, was fined £1 and ordered to replace the money, or in default to undergo fourteen days' imprisonment. The prisoner at Norfolk Assizes was also a secretary of a friendly society who had stolen over £400 of the funds. Mr. Justice Ridley gave him three years' penal servitude. Fourteen days, or three years, for almost precisely similar offences! Such are the uncertainties of justice.

Both cases point to the need of a thorough reform of the system of auditing adopted by friendly societies, and I am glad to learn from the Eastern Daily Press that this point was noticed by Mr. Henry Broadhurst as the presiding magistrate at the police-court hearing of the Norfolk case at Cromer. It is said that the rules of the societies generally make it difficult, if not impossible, to appoint a professional auditor, and also that the members are averse to what one of them described the other day as "the interference of outsiders in their affairs." But the rules can be altered, and in view of the not infrequent occurrence of such cases as the foregoing I hope that the members of such societies will abandon this foolish objection to the adoption of the only sort of auditing that can afford them any real protection.

"Our position in the banking world to-day testifies to the success of our business methods and to the satisfaction of our customers." So runs the widely-published advertisement of a concern bearing the pretentious title of "The Charing Cross Bank," 28, Bedford-street, Charing Cross, and 39, Bishopsgate-street Within. In reality it is not a bank at all, but a common usury-shop run by a man named Carpenter, and the sort of satisfaction customers are likely to get from dealing with it may be judged from the experiences of the plaintiff in a case before Mr. Justice Channell on Friday. The so-called "bank" had granted the plaintiff a loan of £80, taking as security a bill of sale on furniture worth between £300 and £400, a life policy with a surrender value of £20, and certain shares in a company which eventually realised £20. The plaintiff was told that the rate of interest would be about 30 per cent. per annum. As a matter of fact, the interest charged in the bill of sale was 60 per cent., and when he had paid monthly instalments to the amount of £80 plaintiff brought an action against Carpenter claiming relief under the Moneylenders Act.

In granting the desired relief to the extent of reducing the interest from 60 to 30 per cent., Mr. Justice Channell observed:—

> To agree to one thing and to put something else—a rate of interest double that mentioned—into the bill of sale, with a limited amount of explanation as to what the document meant, was enough to make the transaction harsh and inconscionable within the Moneylenders Act.

In other words, his lordship came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was practically tricked into signing a document which, without his knowledge, just doubled the extremely liberal rate of interest that he had undertaken to pay. This judicial pronouncement upon the "business methods" of the Charing Cross Bank (alias Carpenter) will, I trust, do something to open the eyes of the public to the true character of this bloodsucking establishment, whose grossly misleading advertisement figures in so many daily and weekly newspapers.

In a communication directed to me at Truth office, Mr. Fred Watts, 95, Jermyn-street, W., intimates that it is his earnest wish that I should make an appointment with him if I require financial assistance. It seems that he is prepared to advance me from £100 to £50,000 at a few hours' notice, without any objectionable inquiries, upon note of hand. He would do this, moreover, "not as a professional lender, but as a private banker." I might have felt rather flattered by this generous offer, only I found that Mr. Fred Watts has been making a wholesale distribution of similar communications during the past few days. The name, too, seemed familiar, and I discovered that some months ago I had occasion to mention Mr. Fred Watts as a new addition to the ranks of the circularising usurers or—as is more probable in his case—usurers' touts. Really he is not Fred Watts at all, but David Freedman, of 36, Honiton-road, Kilburn—hardly the sort of neighbourhood in which one would look for the residence of a capitalist in a position to chuck about fifty thousands among all and sundry. Freedman, alias Watts, began by issuing his circulars from Laud Chambers, 150, Friar-street, Reading, and it was only on January 22, that he registered 95, Jermyn-street as an additional address. His present circular, with the attached facsimile of his newspaper advertisement, is, by the way, a close imitation of one from "L. Fortescue" (otherwise Abraham Cohen), 40-41, Sackville-street.

BLUE MOONSHINE.

(The Latest Thing in Anæsthetics.)

So chloroform has had its day,
Ether and gas lie sunk in night;
Henceforth a patient's sense away
They'll take with blue electric light.

Nor on the operating board,
Nor in the dentist's chair you'll blench,
But, pain of severed limb ignored,
Unfelt the pang of molar's wrench,

You'll lie, as in a peaceful sleep,
Enraptured by celestial dreams,
The while your steadfast gaze you keep
Upon those pure cœrulean beams.

Or, so they say. They may be right;
No certain means have I to tell.
But why use artificial light?
Why not make Nature serve as well?

If that they'll do, I'll let them prove
On me their novel theory true,
And any part of me remove
By light—for preference *moon*light—blue.

Before the General Election we were assured that ruin was staring us in the face unless we amended our Free Trade ways and 'verted to Protection. Also, that unless we agreed to impose a tax on all foreign produce for the benefit of our Colonies, they would cut the painter and set up in business on their own account. The country, on being consulted, declined to be fooled by such nonsense, and now the defeated alarmists are quarrelling with each other as to whether they will proclaim a tariff truce, and endeavour to get once more into office by admitting that the danger is not so pressing as they had supposed, or whether they will continue their campaign of unreason. If they really believe what they have said, it seems to denote a singular want of patriotism to look calmly on whilst we are going to perdition—much, indeed, as though the crew of a vessel with a leak were to decide to put off pumping until the ship had gone to the bottom.

This discussion among our Unionist friends at once leads to another still more entertaining, namely, what views Mr. Balfour holds about pumps and the necessity for manning them immediately. Consequently, there has been one more attempt to extract from Mr. Balfour a profession of the faith that is in him, and a declaration of what he means to do as a defender of the faith that is outside him. The result, which was made public at Hull last Friday, corresponds to a nicety with the result of all previous efforts in the same direction.

Mr. Balfour tells his followers that his views remain what they always were, and have been repeatedly stated. But that there may be no mistake, he kindly explains once again that he is a free trader as he understands free trade, and a protectionist as he understands protection. He despises ancient shibboleths, which would seem to indicate that he is a tariff reformer, but he puts it in such a way that no tariff reformer can help suspecting that he includes all the ancient shibboleths of protection in his philosophic contempt. He does not see why a monthly bulletin of his convictions is required, seeing that they have never varied. Neither do I, unless the reason be that the bulletins are always amusing reading, and that the process of extracting them yields excellent sport. It is like fox-hunting: the field enjoys it, the spectators revel in it, and I cannot help thinking the fox likes it as much as anybody.

We Radicals have no reason to regret the position into which our opponents have drifted. Until they have decided what is to be their policy, it is not likely that they will convert the country to it. This seems to be the view of the Unionist parliamentary agents. Their business is not to cumber their minds with political issues, but to do their best to secure a majority for any issue which may be adopted by their party leaders. They have, it would seem, notified their leaders that things are going from bad to worse in the party, owing to the uncertainty which prevails as to what are the views and the tactics of these leaders. I entirely disagree with the opinions and the methods of Mr. Chamberlain. But he is far too clever an electioneering hand ever to have allowed his party to act with such supreme folly as has characterised its late doings. The cat is ill, and the mice are playing strange tricks.

The overwhelming majority by which Women's Suffrage was relegated to the dim and distant future at the Belfast Convention of the Labour Party goes far to bear out the opinion which I have so often stated—that working men are in the main opposed to Women's Suffrage whenever it becomes more than a mere pious opinion. Working men prefer a woman to engage in domestic duties rather than gad about on a political mission. They like a man to be a man, and a woman to be a woman, and their wives and daughters share this view. I trust that weak-kneed M.P.s will realise this from the vote of the Convention, and will pluck up sufficient spirit to decline in future to be dictated to in their constituencies by little fussy gangs of unwomanly sisters and unmanly brothers.

Mr. Keir Hardie seems to have been under the impression that he could dictate to his party, and threatened to resign in consequence of the vote. My impression is that his party will bear his resignation with considerable equanimity, should he give effect to his threat, for there are many of his followers in Parliament who would lead the party with equal ability—to say the least.

The position of a Radical—be he working man or not—who votes for propertied women being granted votes on account of their property is an utterly false one. According to the Radical creed the vote belongs to the individual, whether he be rich or poor. It is as absurd for a Radical to vote for the suffrage being granted to propertied women only as it would be for him to give a plural vote to propertied men.

Once let one woman have a parliamentary vote, and, not only all women must have it, but also all must be eligible for election to Parliament. If they were men they would have these rights. It is because they are women that they do not have them. Those, therefore, who break down the sex disqualification must be well aware of what will be the inevitable consequences. One rat is enough to break down the dykes that save Holland from inundation, and one woman is enough to break down the barrier that defends us from the political supremacy of women.

I see it stated that the silly females who made themselves so ridiculous in the precincts of the House of Commons last Session threaten to renew their antics. This comes of treating them with exceptional kindness when they violate the law. If they claim to be the equals of men, they should be so far accommodated as to make them equal in regard to the penalties that await the transgressors of the law. If a gang of men were to riot in the precincts of the House, and to renew this rioting again and again, they would be sent to prison and hard labour without the option of a fine. Why should not women, especially women who claim political equality with men, be treated by the same rule?

In an interview which one of these ladies vouchsafed to grant to a reporter the other day, she said that the wardresses were inclined at first to give themselves airs, but that they were soon put in their proper place. What would be thought of a man who thus discoursed of prison warders when sent to prison because he would not pay a police-court fine? The wardresses are respectable woman who honestly earn their pay, which can hardly be said of most of these silly rioters. The same lady adversely criticised the prison menu, although as first-class misdemeanants they had a right to order and to pay for their own dinners. As martyrs, the suffragettes have been a failure. They howled and shrieked and whimpered when subjected to the very mildest of imprisonment, and no sooner were they let out than they ostentatiously caroused at a fashionable restaurant.

Some of them have means; others have not. The latter, I should fancy, will keep up the game as a pleasing alternative to earning their living by manual work. As for the wealthier ones, they appear to be in a state of intense delight at the notoriety that they have gained, and are, doubtless, reluctant to revert to the position of mere ordinary wives or daughters. Let us hope, however, that this will soon be their fate, and that the wives will return to their household duties, and the daughters to the business of finding husbands, instead of making themselves ridiculous. I do not believe that there are fifty working men in the United Kingdom who would approve of their wives and daughters fighting with policemen in the lobbies of the House of Commons, or playing at martyrdom in a comfortable prison room with nothing to do except to put wardresses in their "proper place."

THE SHORT-SIGHTED PRIMROSE.

Thick fell the Snow one Winter's Night,
Enshrouding all the World in White,
So buried every Rood of Ground
Six Inches deep next Day was found,
And shone the Sun, in Heavens serene,
On one unvaried crystal Scene.
Now, hidden there—or, so they say—
'Neath the white Pall a Primrose lay,
Who, young and eke devoid of Sense,
Railed at her snowy Covering dense,
Because, forsooth, it kept away
The midday Sun's benignant Ray:
"Plague on the Weather's horrid Clerk,
Who keeps me thus in Prison dark,
Where ne'er a Beam of Warmth or Light
Can shed on me its Radiance bright!
I wish," she cried—and, troth, she meant it—
"That Snow had never been invented."
But lo! an Iris, close beside Miss Primrose, thus to her replied:
"'Tis well for you, Miss P.—that's plain—
That you your Wish cannot obtain.
For though 'tis true that Snow, by Day,
Keeps off the Sun's benignant Ray,
'Tis no less true her Blanket white Keeps off malignant Frosts by Night."

Moral.

This Moral I would fain be pressing:

SCRUTATOR.

GERMANY AND SOCIALISM.

THE second ballots in the German elections, so far as they have gone at present, have only accentuated the effect of the original polls. This is generally the tendency of the second ballot, and we may reasonably expect to see it in the elections that have yet to be completed. The original polls seem to have resembled our own General Election of last year in one respect, namely, the exceptional number of votes recorded. Out of a total of 13.1 millions, 11.2 millions voted, as compared with 9.4 out of 12.5 millions at the last previous election. Consequently, all the larger groups have increased their polls substantially. The clerical vote has very largely increased, and the "Centre" comes back from the country fully as strong as it went. The Socialist vote has also increased by more than a quarter of a million, but this seems to have been chiefly in the safe seats, and it has not prevented the loss of twenty-three others—a loss of over 25 per cent. of the strength of the party in the previous Reichstag. The decisive electoral fact has been the enormous increase—over 1,100,000—in the votes cast for the Conservatives, Liberals, and Radicals who support the Government. The parliamentary majority which these groups make up hangs together very loosely, and in this country one would not predict a long life for a Government resting on such a basis. But a German Government, of course, does not rest on any parliamentary basis, and the Kaiser and his Chancellor are entitled to crow, as they have not hesitated to do, over the fact that the country has given them the majority they asked for both in members and votes.

I do not doubt that "Imperialism," as understood in Germany, has played an important part in the elections. But I think it is probable that Socialism contributed quite as much to the result. The Germans are more given to act collectively than we are, but when they are faced with an attempt to carry into effect the socialistic idea of the individual being merged in the State, and all personal property being absorbed by the State, it does not surprise me that they have shown that these are not the views of the majority. I am convinced not only that an election on such lines with us would show that the vast mass of the nation is against any such counsel of perfection, but that the vast mass of working men are against it. Common sense must tell them that no nation could prosper under such conditions. I am not, therefore, afraid of the Socialists. With us, those who profess such doctrines are comparatively few in number. Their leaders, and a few of their followers, may honestly believe in them. But with most of their followers the word Socialist means that they desire such social legislation as may better their lot. In this sense it was that Sir William Harcourt said, quite rightly, "We are all Socialists now." I have always been an advocate for such social legislation, but a good deal that goes by this name seems to me to be impractical. For instance, it is often asserted that every man has a right to employment at such a wage as will enable him and his family to live in decent comfort. This I deny. Every man, woman, and child in the United Kingdom has a right, under the existing law, to food, lodging, and clothing. It would be a fortunate thing if all were able to live in decent comfort, and every possible means should be adopted to render this possible to all who are not hopeless idlers. But a nation left to itself enormously increases in numbers; and if all were free to marry and procreate their species without restraint, it is evident that a moment would come when there would not be means to employ them remuneratively. Sooner or later, such a country would be ruined—I should say sooner.

Our prosperity is dependent upon our being able to sell our manufactured goods abroad. To do so, we must successfully compete in price with other nations.

If we—and the same thing applies to every individual nation—were to adopt the principle that the State should find work at wages sufficient to make them happy and contented for every one who applies for it, wages all round would go up to such a degree that competition with nations which had not adopted this doctrine would be impossible. I know it is vaguely asserted that the money necessary for providing all with work and wages on this comfortable scale could be obtained by levying taxes on the rich exclusively. But men only go into trade in order to grow rich, and they would cease to do so if all the profits that they could expect to make were absorbed by taxation. This would necessitate "widening the area of taxation" by continually reducing the definition of "rich," until in the end the taxation came to be borne by working men themselves. It is very easy to construct a theory having for its object the improvement of the condition of the many, but very difficult to carry the thing out in practice without its resulting in the welfare of none.

By all means let us give a free education to all children who care to avail themselves of it, and equip all with the means of becoming useful as well as prosperous citizens. Let us do all we can to provide remunerative work for all honest and industrious persons who are prevented from finding it by circumstances beyond their control. Let us better the lot of all such men when they are too old to work. Let us see that a poor man can get a sanitary lodging without paying a higher rent than is necessary to cover the cost of providing it. More than all, let us see that neither men nor women are worked for miserably inadequate wages to fill the pockets of some sweater. I should be glad if all workers were able to earn more than they do, though I confess that I have far more sympathy for these unfortunate victims than for the fairly well-to-do, who, already in possession of a good wage, are ever agitating for a better one. All beyond this is Utopia, very well in theory, but impossible in practice, and it would, if attempted, reduce the nation to a horde without self-reliance, individual initiative, or that "push" without which there is no progress. Men would either become little better than children, or would be perpetually seeking to do as little work and get as much for it as they could at the cost of the more industrious. Radicals should ever bear in mind what can be done for the general welfare in this world of ours, and not alone what they would have done. If they do not, they may rest satisfied that there will soon be such a reaction against Radicalism that the Conservatives will be once more in the ascendant.

THE ATTACK ON SIR JOHN FISHER.

In reference to the article on naval policy in last week's Truth, I have received the following letter from an officer for whose opinions I have the highest respect:—

> I am sorry to see Truth falling into line with the clique who are making a dead set against the Admiralty policy of the last two years, and more particularly against the First Sea Lord. I suppose you are aware that "Barfleur" is one of the ringleaders of this faction. I am not concerned to deny his abilities, nor those of one or two officers who are acting more or less in concert with him. In fact, up till recently I have looked upon them rather as prophets of the true naval gospel. But it seems to me—and not to me only—that they are at present rather turning their backs on much of their own teaching, and that their criticism of the new Admiralty policy is simply factious.
> The passages from "Barfleur's" book which appear to have impressed you are sound enough in principle; but if it were not for fear of frightening you by the length of my letter, I think I could show that there is no ground for the fears you express of modern naval education becoming too much a matter of books and theory. In this and many other respects fallacious deductions are made from sound premisses. I note that you have not said anything on the passages in the book which deal with the policy of "scrapping"; but if you should be disposed to do so, I would warn you that the arguments under this head, and on all that relates to the protection of commerce in war are open to question at every point, even from people who have studied history, and honestly endeavoured to learn its lessons.
> In conclusion, let me say that in my opinion if the reduction of expenditure for which you are so anxious should ever be brought about, it is far more likely to come from Sir John Fisher and his colleagues than the people who are making this organised attack on them.

My correspondent is unnecessarily alarmed about the backsliding of Truth. I paid the book in question the compliment of acknowledging its "clear thinking," and having found in it certain arguments which confirm what I have always believed, I made my own use of them. But heaven defend me from identifying myself with any professional school of thought on naval matters or any other, except in so far as its tenets may be intelligible to the mind of a layman. When it comes to discussing such matters as the strategic distribution of the fleet, the respective functions of "capital ships" and cruisers, or the tactical value of speed, I simply settle myself in a back seat, and endeavour not to go to sleep.

What is said, however, in the above letter as to the campaign against Sir John Fisher is perfectly true, and must be familiar to every regular reader of the newspapers and magazines. The campaign is developed without any disguise in a book published last week by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co., entitled "The State of the Navy in 1907," by "Civis." Like "Barfleur's" book, this is a reprint of various newspaper articles criticising the present Admiralty policy; but more significant than the articles themselves is the preface by the Editor of the Spectator, who published them in the first instance. Mr. Strachey puts what he has to say in Spectator language. If I were to translate it into my own it would come to something like this: that Sir John Fisher is the most dangerous type of man that could possibly be placed in his position; that he has a genius for advertising, but for little else; that next to this his chief characteristics are inordinate confidence in his own opinion, and overbearing determination to have his own way in everything; that by his irresistible self-assertion he has made three successive First Lords his helpless tools, and converted the Admiralty into "a one-man show" (I quote Mr. Strachey here); that his naval reforms are at variance with all sound principles, and his boasted economies empty shams; that his reputation as a reformer is merely the result of a clever system of nobbling the press; and that in reality under him "the Service is going to the dogs" at an unprecedented pace. "Civis" explains all this more in detail, and the upshot of it is that there must be immediately a public inquiry into the state of the Navy, with a view to the prompt suppression of this naval terror and impostor.

This is a new development of the "naval scare" business, but personally it leaves me unmoved. This is not because I regard Sir John Fisher as an infallible naval Pontiff; on the contrary, I dare say he has made mistakes, like other people. But I have noticed that we are always treated to attacks of this kind when a strong man arises as a reformer in the Army or the Navy, and that the vehemence of the attack is generally in exact proportion to the utility of his reforms. Another thing which allays my uneasiness is that very different views are held in France and Germany, and particularly in Germany, where everything relating to the British Navy is studied most carefully and most intelligently. It is conceivable, of course, that Sir John Fisher, having by skilful use of the British press impressed his countrymen with an entirely false conception of his personality and talents, may have employed the same arts on the Continent, and created the same results among foreign observers. But it does not sound very probable, and I regard the opinion of competent German critics that the British Navy has vastly increased in efficiency and readiness for war during the last two or three years as worth more than the carpings of British critics who have axes of their own to grind, or pet theories of their own to air, whose toes have been trodden on in the process of reform, or who are in want of a little cheap capital for party purposes. All these classes are to be found among Sir John Fisher's critics. In saying this I am not depreciating criticism of the Admiralty. Heaven forbid! The more we have of it, on rational lines, the better. All I mean to convey is that I profoundly distrust criticism which has an alarmist tendency, and which takes the form of an undiscriminating personal attack upon a reformer who seems to have done a good many wise and useful things. There is a proper field for criticising naval administration, namely, the House of Commons, and whenever a genuine "case for inquiry" arises against any Government department we are certain to hear it there, and to hear the defence as well as the attack. By all means let those who believe that the Admiralty is at present engaged in ruining the Navy do their best to raise the issue in Parliament. The public can then form its opinion under proper guidance. In the meantime, I would recommend an attitude of scepticism.

CATHOLIC TRUSTS AND THE CHARITY COMMISSION.

When the Roman Catholic trusts question was under discussion in Truth last autumn, it was mentioned in one of the Catholic papers that some application on the subject had been made to the Charity Commissioners. The history of this application has lately been brought to my knowledge, and it seems to merit publicity on more than one ground. It seems that a Catholic layman who, like many others, was greatly concerned at the revelations of the irregular dealings of various bishops with the trust funds of their dioceses, made a formal communication to the Charity Commissioners about the beginning of last October, inviting their official action for the protection of such trusts. For obvious reasons the gentleman in question was not, and is not, desirous that his name should be brought before the public. The task of "belling the cat" in this matter is a peculiarly invidious one, which is one of the reasons why the bishops have enjoyed such a free hand in their dealings with Church property. We will therefore call the gentleman Mr. A. After preliminary communication with the Commissioners, he forwarded to them detailed statements respecting the misapplication of a number of trusts—chiefly those which have been referred to from time to time by various correspondents of Truth, the only new one being the Market Rasen endowment, which has more recently been mentioned in these columns in connection with the treatment of Father Hays by Bishop Brindle of Nottingham. After this document had been placed before the Commissioners, Mr. A. received the following letter from the Charity Commission, dated October 22:

> Sir,—In reply to your letter received at this Office on the 17th inst., I am to say that the Charity Commissioners are not yet in a position to institute such inquiries as you suggest, and that it would probably be the most convenient course that you should call here by appointment when you are next in London, in order that the difficulty of the case may be explained to you. A single interview will probably be sufficient for the purpose.
> Meanwhile I may explain that not all charitable endowments are subject to the Charity Commissioners' jurisdiction; those which are maintained by voluntary contributions are expressly exempted by statute. Also it is not within the competence of the Commissioners to hold a roving inquiry upon hearsay evidence. They would require as a preliminary to be furnished with extracts from the wills or instruments of foundation by which the charities have been founded to which their attention is directed.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
> Tho. Allchin.

In consequence of this communication, Mr. A. had an interview with one of the staff at the office of the Charity Commission. In view of what followed, it is important to observe that immediately after leaving the office he made a note on paper of the substance of the conversation. The effect of what passed, as recorded by him, was that while the Charity Commissioners would not refuse to exercise their jurisdiction if the requisite information was laid before them, they would much prefer that a question relating to the administration of ecclesiastical trusts should be dealt with by ecclesiastical authority; that they considered that if the allegations made by Mr. A. were laid before the Pope, the Pope would deal with them himself; but that if redress could not be obtained in this way, then the Commissioners would not refuse to exercise their authority. Their attitude is clearly indicated by one phrase which Mr. A. reports as having been used in the course of the conversation—namely, that the Commissioners did not wish, if they could help it, to have "to wash a lot of dirty Catholic linen in public."

As the result of this conversation, Mr. A. went home, and at once wrote a confidential letter to the Papal Foreign Secretary, Cardinal Merry del Val. In this letter he stated what had passed at the interview, very much as I have stated it above, and expressed his personal hope that in view of all that had transpired recently, "it might seem wise to his Eminence to recommend to the Holy Father prompt, public, and immediate measures." The letter was a long one, and contained, of course, other observations of the writer upon the situation, but this is the substance of it. Mr. A. wrote to the Cardinal on November 7. On November 28, not having received any reply, he again wrote to the Cardinal as follows:—

I beg that your Eminence will be so good as to give me some sort of reply to my letter of the 7th inst., as I shall have to make a report concerning the execution of my instructions to the Charity Commissioners. They informed me that they were willing to wait a reasonable time to see whether the Holy See would deal with the matter; but in view of the seriousness of the cases brought before them, they cannot suspend action beyond a reasonable time. . . . . .

The next thing that Mr. A. heard was the following letter from the Charity Commission, dated December 6:—

Sir,—A copy of your letter of the 28th ult. to Cardinal Merry del Val has been forwarded to the Charity Commissioners for their information by Messrs. Witham, Roskell, Munster, and Weld, on behalf of the Archbishop of Westminster.

Messrs. Witham have been informed that you have no authority to speak in the name of the Commissioners, or to state what steps they propose to take, and that, as a fact, they have expressed no intention of inquiring into the administration of the funds in question. I am at the same time to express the surprise of the Commissioners that you should have purported to act on their behalf.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Fred C. Henry.

Mr. A. made a suitable reply, justifying his part in the correspondence that had passed; and the incident seems to have closed at this point, not only as regards Mr. A., but as regards the matters to which he had directed the attention of the Charity Commission.

As I have observed more than once, I have never had much faith in the Charity Commission as an instrument for redressing the scandals that have arisen in connection with the administration of Roman Catholic trusts. The story of Mr. A.'s negotiations fully justifies that view, but I confess I should not have expected that the Charity Commissioners would cut such an unbecoming figure as they do in the foregoing transactions. It is easy to understand their reluctance to tackle the thorny question relating to the respective jurisdictions of the State and the Papacy over the property of the Roman Catholic Church in England. It may be that political expediency, as well as the personal convenience of the Commissioners, suggest that, if possible, the question should be disposed of by the ecclesiastical authorities themselves. But obviously a public body, constituted by Act of Parliament for certain specific purposes, has no right to allow considerations of this kind to interfere with the performance of its official duties. Its machinery ought to work without regard for persons or outside influences of any kind. If, when the machinery has begun to work, the parties concerned choose to settle their differences privately and abandon the proceedings, it is quite right to give them every opportunity of doing so, whether the object be to avoid expense, or unseemly quarrelling and scandal. The position is the same as in legal proceedings, where the defendant is always at liberty to settle with the plaintiff before the case comes into Court, while even after that point is reached a Judge may properly use his influence to bring the parties to terms without proceeding to extremities. But it would be a very different matter for a Judge, as soon as a writ was taken out, to send for the plaintiff privately, and suggest that he should inform the defendant that the Court did not want to try such a case, and would prefer that he should settle with the plaintiff spontaneously, but that if he did not the Court would possibly make it unpleasant for him. That is practically the same thing as the course taken by the Charity Commissioners in the present case. Mr. A. is in the position of a plaintiff; the Commissioners are the Court; the Roman Catholic episcopacy are the defendants. What follows when the Court takes this course is only what might have been expected, and shows the procedure to be as futile as it is irregular. As soon as the parties on the other side learn what Mr. A. has said, they come straight to the Commissioners, and ask, "Did you authorise this?" Whereupon the Commissioners are compelled to say, "No," and throw over their intermediary.

I do not perceive what other construction than this can be put upon the transaction. Why did the Commissioners specially invite Mr. A. to a personal interview instead of putting what they had to say into a letter? There is no visible reason for it but the obvious one, that they could not put what they desired to say into writing without risking a very nasty outcry if their letter should ever become public. Manet scripta litera; a personal conversation can always be disavowed or explained away. But it occasionally happens that the acts of the parties throw a light upon a conversation which sufficiently elucidates the truth in spite of a conflict of evidence as to what was really said. We do not know at present what version the Charity Commissioners may give of the conversation of their representative with Mr. A. All we know is that they repudiate having authorised him to speak in their name, and are surprised that he should "purport to act on their behalf." In point of fact, he had neither spoken in their name nor purported to act on their behalf; he had merely communicated to Cardinal Merry del Val the effect of a conversation which he understood to have been held for no purpose except that it should be so communicated, and of which, to preclude mistakes, he made a note immediately afterwards and before writing to the Cardinal. The Charity Commissioners' disclaimer is, therefore, not precisely to the point. On the other hand, it is beyond dispute that the Commissioners did send for Mr. A., presumably to say to him something which they preferred not to say in writing; and that as the result of what was said to him, Mr. A. (who had previously had no idea of doing anything of the sort, but was endeavouring to set the Charity Commissioners in motion) sat down straight away and wrote his communication to Cardinal Merry del Val. Whatever version of the incident may be put forth on the side of the Charity Commissioners, I do not see, in the face of these facts, how it can be doubted that the Commissioners did suggest to the gentleman that he should communicate with the Holy See, and if that is so, there is nothing else in the case worth arguing about. The communication suggested must have been practically to the effect represented by Mr. A. It must have been conveyed to Mr. A. that the Commissioners considered the matter one in which Rome should act in the first instance. It must have been thought and suggested that, failing such action, the matter would fall within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commission, for if it was not within their jurisdiction they would have no locus standi to make suggestions to Rome or to anybody else, and would have no duty in the matter except to tell Mr. A. plainly that it was not a case in which they could interfere at all.

Now that the facts are out, notwithstanding the diplomatic tactics of the Charity Commission, it is to be hoped that more will be heard of them. Public authorities, when duly appealed to for the performance of their statutory duties, cannot be allowed to resort to devious means of evading them; nor to employ as instruments for that purpose those who seek their aid, and subsequently repudiate them when the result does not work out as expected. Nor is it right that a formal application to a public authority should be killed, as it seems to have been in this case, by irregular procedure of this kind. These are matters that Parliament should look into.

THE CABMAN OF THE FUTURE.

It is rather a way with ideals that, when they are theoretically attained, they are nearly always practically unpleasant in their results. I have a shrewd suspicion that sixpenny cab-fares is going to be one of them. Officially it is already upon us, or in the nearest future, for have we not read in black and white, in the draft of a new order proposed to be made by the Home Secretary, that for a horse-drawn cab carrying a taximeter the fare for a journey within the four-mile radius shall be for "One mile and not exceeding twelve minutes —6d"? Whatever the Home Secretary may think, I do not personally imagine that much will come of this order, because human beings have human weaknesses, and the first man who is bold enough to hand a cabman sixpence with the remark, "There is your fare," will have to be a demi-god—unless, indeed, he is an elderly maiden lady. And, again speaking personally, I think it will be a very good thing if that official ideal never does materialise in practice, for several reasons. For one thing, it will certainly do away with the cabman, as we know and love him. For a second, it will be another move in the organised conspiracy to do away with the individuality of London. For a third, it will go far towards making the presently amiable and polite Cockney almost as insufferably boorish as is the Berliner himself. None of which things are desirable.

Every one loves a cabman—especially the editors of comic papers. He appeals to our primitive instincts—he is the last survival of the days when we lived exclusively by rapine and murder—he is the one figure surviving among us who exists upon licensed blackmail. I except the barrel-organist, who is, of course, a foreigner. Fifty years ago the cabman had a comrade in the omnibus tout. The omnibus tout still lives for us in the pages of Dickens; in real life he has long since given way to the politely sentimental conductor. The cabman, again, is the one Englishman who still preserves the native force and vigour of our language in the face of American competition. He is the one still unchoked fountain of English undefiled; destroy him, and within ten years we shall all be saying "Dog gone it, man!" or "Dodrabbit it!" having laid aside for ever our homely British "Damn!" And destroy him is just what the Home Secretary seems determined to do. This is quite evident in the time-clause he introduces. The length of a mile is still an arguable quantity; the taximeter is not invariable in its judgments, as any one who has travelled twice over the same route in a Paris "voiture taximétre" can testify; but not the most erratic of watches can vary more than a few seconds within the limits of twelve minutes. And every one—except the very rich, who drive in carriages—wears a watch nowadays. The cabman, then, struggle how he may, will have his one chance of making a living swept away from him; for it is become a truism that no man can pay the exorbitant rent charged by proprietors for the vehicles and live upon the legal fare, even at present rates. It is true that the taximeter is not made imperative upon the horse-drawn cab for the moment, but a close-fisted public will soon make it so, unofficially. Nothing will then be left for our old friend but to give up the struggle, to enter the service of one of the motor-cab companies—for what cabman could afford to set up a mocab on his own account?—and to accept a weekly wage as humbly as though he were a grocer's assistant. When that day comes English will become a dead language. The cabman will have no further reason for strengthening or enriching his native vocabulary; he will take no more interest in the matter of fares than does a railway-guard; he will, in fact, become as servilely polite, in the hope of an arbitrary tip.

But disaster to our language is by no means the worst that is to be feared. For the chances are at least ten to one that the wage-paid motor-taximeter-cabman will wear a uniform. He will inevitably wear a motor-cap, which is a determined step in the uniform direction. And what will become of his individuality then? For his individual existence is bound up in the individuality of his costume, and especially in that of his head wear. It is the fact that he can wear at fancy a moth-eaten bowler or the smartest of "toppers" that marks out the free man from the slave. It is true that wearing a uniform does not prevent a man from being rude. It usually makes him more so. But it is a different and less lovable kind of rudeness—it is sullen rather than airy. The cabman in a mouldy bowler stands towards his fare in the position of an equal party in a bargain—if anything, the advantage is on his side, and he knows it. Uniformed, he is become but the humble agent of another—a servus, a slave. He dare not give full play to the malignancy of his fancy, lest he be reported to his superiors and lose his job. He can only mutter evil words in his heart, not wear them on his lips. The influence of uniform upon public manners is always for evil. Consider its results in Germany. The Germans are naturally an amiable, friendly, polite people, or were before the Prussianising of their Empire forced them as a nation into uniformity. Nowadays, when every one from the Oberpostmeister to the Underbutcherboy wears the nearest available approach to a military uniform, they have become a nation of bullies, lacking alike in manners and in moral tone, regarding their neighbours, and especially their English cousins, with the darkest suspicion and the liveliest dislike. If you doubt it, go to Berlin, and mark the manners of the tramway conductors. Are we content to surrender our free-born, free-hatted cabby in exchange for a Strandful of imitation Berlin bobbies?

Think of the effect upon the rest of us. Should we not also catch the infection? Would not London, from being the most amiable, the best-mannered city in the world, become like any Continental capital—should we not all become dissatisfied, infected, servile plotters? Should we not be sowing the seeds for disturbances beside which the French Revolution were child's play. We risk all that and more if we consent to throw aside the cabman's hat.

It is perhaps too late to deplore the loss of London's individuality, for it is almost gone already, and not even the impassioned words of a free untaximetered cabman might avail to check its going. They have taken from us our dear old narrow inconvenient streets and forced upon us Continental boulevards; they have deprived us of our once proud boast of living in the most inconvenient city in the world and forced upon us speedy means of transit whether we want them or not; they have stolen from us our cheery bus-drivers and forced upon us melancholy mechanics clinging spasmodically to a wheel; the horse must give way to the machine; so must our own dear, dirty London give place to an Americanised, Parisianised, Prussianised, metropolised metropolis, wherein streets and shops and vehicles and people shall have not one distinctive or distinguishing feature among them all. Perhaps it is as well that the cabman should go—that he should not be left like a prehistoric Triton melancholy and alone among a drab uniformity of minnows. Perhaps the Home Secretary realises this, and has officialised sixpenny cab fares out of the spirit of philanthropy to help the tendenz of the times. If so, he is a far-sighted statesman indeed, and I retract all that I have written. Also I have the satisfaction of reflecting that, regularise our London as they may, we shall always have our weather to mark out England as a place apart, a something that defies classification and regularity. And let the Home Secretary do his worst with it.

THE THEATRES.

"When Knights were Bold," at Wyndham's.

When were knights bold? I should say at Wyndham's during the last few minutes of the second act of Mr. Marlowe's original farce in three acts. Mr. Marlowe ought almost to be made a knight for his audacious efforts to supply Mr. James Welch with absurdities to say and make us laugh, with absurdities to do and make us laugh again. As for Sir James Welch himself, I feel I am merely forestalling his approaching call to Windsor Castle when I dub him the Knight of the "Forty Winks."

These forty winks are taken after much strife between the very modern Sir Guy de Vere and his environment. All have different designs upon him: Lady Rowena, marriage and a more dignified attitude to life than that assumed by Sir Guy; Isaac Isaacson, marriage with his more than comely daughter Sarah (a part which Miss Daisy Cornell made sympathetic by her grace and quiet playing, even when manacled in the twelfth century of the second act); others have designs both mercenary and matrimonial, like Sir Brian, or merely ecclesiastical mercenary, like the Rev. Peter.

But I shall not develop these at length, because the whole plot hangs about the acutely auburn head of Sir Guy, and it is far more important to note whether he really dips his feet in a footbath to cure his bad cold—well acted at the end of the first act—than whether the Rev. Peter or Isaacson, the Jew, triumph in their transaction, which is conducted on an old principle said to be in use among the Jesuits, but I believe not altogether restricted to them: "the end justifies the means." Yes, Sir James Welch is the play, and he plays it with an overflow of artful vitality which to my innocent mind is very entertaining.

Seven centuries roll back as he takes his forty winks at the end of act the first. What was a piece of tapestry is now the battlements of his castle—younger by 700 years. I think this arrangement rather ingeniously made, for here Mr. Marlowe introduces every one of his former characters in their mediæval guise. Isaacson, the successful financier of the twentieth century, is dragged in chains before trembling Sir James (Sir Guy in the play), accused of usury. Sir James is for pardon, but not so the proud prelate, preincarnation of the affable and Rev. Peter. The prelate is for the utmost rigour of the torture chamber, but Sir James Welch always rises to the occasion when necessary, and probably in part stimulated with the sight of the flowing locks of the beauteous Jewess (same as act I., with hair down), orders prelate and retainers to give the Jew fair passage from his castle. Numberless absurdities, which Sir James makes amusing, culminate in Sir Brian's challenge to Sir James. This haughty knight of seven hundred years ago is also detested of his host, Sir James, in the twentieth century, and one is not, therefore, surprised to see the latter accept the challenge, though I think that if you go to see him, the manner and mode of his accoutrement will make you laugh. He sallies forth and returns, followed by Sir Brian, after a battle which one understands to have been uncertain in its issue. Sir James is not well acquainted with the manner of combating with the broad-sword, and, fortunately for him, Sir Brian seems equally ignorant of the use that might be made of an elegant iron ball adorned with six-inch spikes that depends by a chain from an iron rod which he holds in his hand. Sir James at last falls to with the mailed fist, and, sure of his skill in this exercise, with a few well-delivered punches, he very soon has his rival panting upon his back, and proudly plants his foot upon his breast. Persecuted nuns and retainers crowd around Sir James, who begins to think that the eighth century is not so bad after all, till they bring him a cup of sack, in lieu of a brandy and soda. Then Sir James makes one of his inimitable faces, and it is soon time to pass forward seven hundred years again and to find the Knight of the Forty Winks, with memories all too vivid of his dream, running a-tilt against the other characters, who, of course, appear as in the first act. More fooling on the part of Sir James, but, forsooth, 'tis good fooling.

It would, of course, be permissible to indulge in regrets that so fine an actor as Mr. James Welch should don so persistently the cap and bells. I do regret it. I trust that I may have the pleasure of seeing him in some more serious expression of dramatic art during the course of the year. But at the theatre one is bound to take things as they come, and if Mr. Welch says "laugh at me instead of with me," why, I am ready to do so, although I know he is capable of greater things.

"Miss Hook of Holland," at the Prince of Wales's.

Mr. Paul Rubens, the author and composer of this play, save for the collaboration of Mr. Hurgon in parts of the book, modestly disclaims any ambitious designs, by terming the score a series of jingles, the libretto mere chatter. Thus severe on himself he wisely disarms criticism, which could easily point out what Mr. Rubens knows well, namely, that the work is not of an important nor of a highly original character. It has been constructed simply to please by the usual methods of musical comedy, and much attention has been given to the accessories, which go to make success in this kind. The scenery and scenic arrangements are not gorgeous, but they are carefully indicative of the Dutch environment, from which the action of the play does not move. The dresses are exceedingly picturesque, and it is a pleasure to see how much of luxury can be insinuated into the garbs of the workpeople in old Hook's distillery, when we come to the triumph of the last act. The story is of the simplest nature, depending upon the stealing of the recipe for "Cream of the Sky" liqueur. Ostentatiously lost by old Hook in the market-place of Arndyk, it is found by one, Slinks, the most eloquent representative of the professional unemployed, and by him conveyed to the officer who wishes to marry Miss Hook, the heiress. But the heiress does not love the officer; she prefers the bandmaster of his regiment. Hence the friction, and hence the resolve of the said officer to use the document to force the hand of Hook into giving him the hand of Hook's daughter. Reckless of duty, the youthful bandmaster exchanges the place of bottler with the identical professional unemployed who sold the recipe to the officer, and the second act finds everyone converging upon the distillery. Needless to add that by the well-known law of such plays as this, the officer fails to secure the lady, and the bandmaster is spared the punishment he deserves for leaving his regiment by the agency of the fair Miss Hook. Miss Hook, indeed, triumphs vocally all along the line, as she triumphs in the story, securing her lover's pardon by threatening the officer, if he does not grant it, with the revelation of his misuse of the recipe. The officer is therefore bound to content himself with a young lady who sings daintily a little song in the second act, and I do not think he is much to be pitied. Hand in hand with the bandmaster, her future spouse, Miss Hook bows her thanks to the plaudits of the crowd.

"Miss Hook of Holland" is worth seeing for several reasons, the most important being the excellence of the cast. First, we have the fine character study of old Hook, by Mr. G. P. Huntley, who, in his tall hat and brown velvet, contrives to be the most living of the personages in this real fairy tale. His part, indeed, stands out from the rest by the wit and incisiveness of almost every word he utters, and I should not be surprised if the actor were part-author of his part. Mr. Barrett gave an admirable study of the humorous vagabond unemployed, and he was well supported by his group, including the somnambulist, who drew forth laughter. Mr. Hyde did justice to his tenor part, and conducted his band on the stage as gallantly as he conducted his love affair with Miss Isabel Jay in the title rôle. There are also inwoven with the doings of the principal characters above referred to the brightest episodes of the evening. Miss Gracie Leigh was all grace and vivacity as the pretty employee of the distillery, despite her numberless petticoats. Indeed, she made of these material for a triumph in the song enumerating the donors of each of these coloured undergarments: "I've a pretty pink petty from Peter" is sure to be a popular favourite. Miss Leigh's success shows what can be done without much voice by talent and the gift of pleasing. Mr. Herbert Clayton plays the part of the scheming officer, and his fine voice and fine presence made his principal song, "Soldiers of the Netherlands," go with a will.

The chorus of fair young maidens was well selected, well trained, and picturesquely dressed, the effects obtained by the two shades of blue in the costumes in the distillery scene of the second act being especially agreeable. Mr. Rubens's music is just what is needed for this sort of entertainment: light and tuneful, and occasionally, as in the workmen's song of the second act, of some merit, as music.

"The Lady Dandies," at Daly's.

Wednesday evening of last week saw the return of the prodigal. Mr. Huntley Wright was playing the part of St. Amour in this, one of the most dainty, and certainly the most picturesque, comic operas which I have seen for a long time. Perhaps it is not quite fair to call Mr. Wright a prodigal, save in the generous sense of being prodigal with his talents to amuse. I watched his little excursion into the domain of comedy with much interest, and really regretted that in his short season at the Comedy Theatre he had not been more fortunate in his choice of plays. For Mr. Wright has great versatility and a happy knack of moulding rebellious material to take the imprint of his fantastic talent. Thus as St. Amour he had to play the prefect of Parisian police and the much-disliked husband of Lodoiska. Yet he contrived to strike the note of his temperament in this part, and with great discretion gradually to work up to his effects and set the house into convulsions of laughter. Miss Gabrielle Ray is another new comer to Daly's, and as the merveilleuse wife of Des Gouttières, contributed much with her delicate dancing in blue and silver, and with her shrilly piping voice, which people have got to like, to the success of this edition of the "Lady Dandies." Miss Orme was not in her best voice, yet gave a very charming performance of Illyrine, and if she does not now sing the song, "Said I to the gay Director," which I liked so much the first night, its place is taken by other numbers not less gay than the Director.

Hengler's Circus.

There are some changes at Hengler's, which make a second visit worth paying by those who like this sort of entertainment. The most noticeable performance among these is that of Tamamoto in his wire-walking act. "Clownland" tries to epitomise the doings of the day, in the form of a Revue. On the Filmograph were exhibited some fine pictures of Niagara Falls.

Opening of The Playhouse.

Mr. and Mrs. Maude made by their own quaintness, and by that of their little duologue, written by Mr. Bernard Shaw, quite an original affair of this occasion. Full of hesitations and intentional slips, Mr. Maude led us gently along to the catastrophe and the hearty laughter of the upset desk, and the terror of another collapse of the station. Mr. and Mrs. Maude were supported, also, on this occasion by Mr. Tree, who was very rhetorical, and by Mr. and Mrs. Bourchier, who played their favourite "Sixes and Sevens" excellently well.

Whereas the majority of folk try to give publicity to such dates in their lives as their golden or silver wedding, Mr. and Mrs. Maude proceeded in an exactly opposite manner on this public occasion. They made of it, as far as possible, a family affair, trying to make everyone present feel he or she was assisting at an intimate council of friends. Thus, with much of grace and much of accident designed, we reached the performance of that apparently immortal work, "Toddles."

On the 15th of this month there will be given a special matinée at the New Royalty Theatre, in aid of the French Hospital and the French Benevolent Society in London. Half of the proceeds will, however, be handed over to the Lord Major's fund for the relief of the sufferers by the earthquake in Jamaica. Mlle. Jeanne Granier, Miss Marie Tempest, Mr. Lewis Waller, and other leading lights of the stage, have volunteered their services for this performance, which will doubtless be thoroughly successful. Mr. T. B. Davis has given the theatre, free of charge.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF LANCASTER.

THE extreme privacy of the King and Queen's visit has been taken as a fresh proof of his Majesty's love for Paris. He and the Queen have come, as it were, to make Paris their home for the time they arrange to stay at the British Embassy, to live an informal life, and to do generally as Parisians do, casting aside the irksome restraints and formalities of official life, and being simply themselves in the midst of a friendly people who really see in the King a charming boulevardier. They have not suffered any official personage to be disturbed on their account. By the King's expressed desire, the Prefect of Police and his official private secretary did not appear on the platform of the Northern Railway as the King and Queen stepped from their train. They were the Duke and Duchess of Lancaster, and might have been merely a private lady and gentleman rich enough to travel in a sumptuous train of their own. The terminus was kept quite private so long as they were there. They have enjoyed much greater privacy at the British Embassy than any hotel could have afforded.

Queen Victoria used to come as Countess of Balmoral. I do not recollect her coming as Duchess of Lancaster. The last Duke of Lancaster who came here was Henry IV., when Richard II. banished him. The circumstances under which that King exiled him fill a stirring act in "Richard II." Rather curiously, he and his eldest son, who joined him in Paris, became popular among the bourgeoisie, and especially in the Mont Ste. Geneviève. Their presence in Paris and the subsequent revolution in England drew French attention to English politics. This had a marked effect on the political events that passed in Paris between the return of the Duke of Lancaster to England and the coronation of Henry IV. in Notre Dame. France had grown very tired of the misrule of the four uncles of Charles IV., and the dissipation of his brother and eldest son. Paris was more intelligent and tired than the rest of France, and longed, and then revolted, to place the finances under the direct control of a Parliament as in England. The Sorbonne headed the movement. It is not generally understood that Henry V. came here because a strong party in Paris wanted him. The view the French took of Parliamentary government in England early in the fifteenth century was that taken since by every great English constitutional lawyer.

I see that the Royal Commission appointed in England in 1901 to inquire into the subject of consumption in human beings and in cattle has just issued its report. The French papers give extracts from it. The curious coincidence that made me meet M. Paul Cagny last week and talk on that very subject with that distinguished veterinary surgeon and writer suggested to me the idea of seeing him again. He had not read the report of the Royal Commission. I showed him a quotation from it, in which it is stated that "milk containing bacilli is undoubtedly responsible for cases—fatal cases—of consumption in human beings, and that a large proportion of cases of consumption in human beings is due to meat."

"Yes, that is interesting," remarked M. Cagny, after glancing over the paragraph; "I do not, however, know about a 'large proportion.' This was one of the very questions we went into at our annual meeting the other day. M. Lignières and Professor Vallée both stated their opinion that nine-tenths of human consumption was of human origin, and other authorities concurred. The Royal Commission has no doubt evidence, but I would like to see it."

"Well, what is your own opinion?".

"I think that a child runs greater risk on account of disease in its family than on account of the milk it drinks. Mind, this is merely my own feeling. We are treading on very uncertain ground. Ten years ago the very doctrine the Royal Commission has just laid down was one of the 'accepted truths' of medical science. Then came a violent reaction. The 'accepted truth' became a 'demonstrated falsehood.' Just now we are unsettled; our minds are in a state of anarchy. If any enlightenment comes from England, I shall be very happy."

M. Cagny told me that from a very long experience he found that five years was about the time many respected medical opinions took to run their course.

Molière, who was never tired of railing at medicine, makes a doctor in one of his plays remark: "Hippocrates says 'yes,' Galen says 'no.'" If either of these Greeks were living now, and members of the Academy of Medicine, they would both say "yes" and "no"—turn about every five years. And so the pendulum swings. But, on the whole, we seem to be getting wiser.

Guiraud, in adapting "Anna Karenina" for the Théâtre Antoine, has Frenchified it considerably. He has brought out its resemblance to "Frou-Frou" in the scene in which Anna returns home and embraces her youthful son, and in the scenes at Venice. Be it observed that the publication of "Frou-Frou" preceded that of Tolstoy's novel, and that while the cuisine is his own, the plot may have been drawn from the French play, in which Aimée Desclée was at her best. Gémier has effected miracles of stage management, but his lieutenant, Caillaux, has effected nothing short of a miracle in the management of the train which kills Anna in the last act. It is an express going at full speed in a cutting, casting out the proper amount of smoke and steam, and winding its way in the distance as should a well-regulated train, in which any of us might travel. Nothing in the play drew more applause than this instrument of the dark destiny that rules the heroine's life and serves as her executioner. I say "heroine" with deliberation. One feels, despite her wrongdoings, deeply interested in her, and one cannot but hope that in heaven, where there are no marriages, and therefore no call for divorce judges, she may have a high and happy place. Anna is very much what the French call une grande amoureuse. The part is sustained by Mme. Mégard. You have her very close parallel in an English novel, superlatively vulgar and yet extremely dramatic, "East Lynne," by the late Mrs. Henry Wood. Tolstoy was at most pains in writing his sad novel to give relief to the interesting dreamer Lévine, in whom he saw himself as in a perfect mirror, and he painted Kitty with the affection an author ought to feel for the young lady to whom he is engaged, and in whom he can see no fault. Both are pared away almost to nothing in the play. Playgoers do not care for dreamers and Lévine. Gémier is the husband from whom Anna runs away with Captain Wronsky, the fiancé of her dear friend and guest, Kitty Tcherbatsky. This young lady is also considerably pared away by the adapter. She is only brought in in the first act to suggest previsions of the future rascality of Wronsky. One is therefore prepared from the moment that Anna makes up her mind to elope that he will grow tired of their égoïsme à deux. Gaston Severin personates Wronsky, but I think he does not enough show the barbarian that underlies the stylish officer, who no doubt is in the habit of carousing at Cubat's after he has been spending the evening seeing the pièces aux jambes at the Marie Theatre. A sort of Skobeleff, redolent of scented soap and smelling of drink taken the day before, would have done perhaps better. There is nothing at all of the refined Frenchman in the Russian officer who sets up to Boulevard chic.

The humblest Frenchmen, provided they do not come from Normandy or the North-Eastern provinces, have, though they do not perhaps know it, pedigrees extending three thousand years back. The noblest Russians are, compared to this, of mushroom growth — a reason possibly why none of us in this part of the world can understand their ways. One feels their recent upriso in the works of Tolstoy. The characters that M. Guiraud cast into the theatrical mould are fine flowers of an old civilisation, in speech, manners, and modes of dressing—save when Wronsky is in his uniform, and his fast friend, Serpoukhoskoy, who has won glory in military expeditions in Asia, is in that of a general. These and other uniforms were procured in Russia by an aide-de-camp of the Duke of Leuchtenberg, Dimitri Oznobichine. This distinguished person is also a major in the Lancers of the Guard, and is now living away from Nihilists and bomb explosions in the studio of a great artist, deceased, on the Boulevard de Clichy. He took great pains to secure local colour for the stage-manager and the personages. The piece is in seven tableaux. The Tsarkoe Selo racecourse, where Wronsky, as the gentleman rider in a military steeplechase, gets badly hurt in a fall, might, were there a Mont Valérien in the background, pass for that of Longchamp.

The Venice tableaux met with the approval of that evergreen octogenarian, Ziem. One finds from the drawing-room scenes that Russian ladies in society are just as rosses as their Parisian sisters. But then they are more provincial in rosserie, as they hate seriously and for a long time. French people in a corresponding sphere soon grow tired of hating. The snow scene in a Russian barine's residence calls for sumptuous fur. Anna spares no expense on hers, nor do the other ladies who regard her as a sinner whom they ought to shun. We have no ball, as the action in the Russian scenes always goes forward in the day time. The toilettes in panne, in velvet, in soft satins, are in the First Empire style, with short waists, white lace, and silks of light and yet bright shades are warmed up with Russian sables, ermine stoles, chinchilla trimmings and collars, and blue fox furs. The weeping feathers are known in the Rue de la Paix as pleureuses, and may cost from 100 francs to 1,000 francs apiece or more. The wrappers must be the terror of playgoers at St. Petersburg, where there is a tendency to exaggerate Rue de la Paix sumptuosity. Anna Karenina wears at the races a black velvet robe bordered with chinchilla, and a coat of the same stuff dotted over with embroidered roses as natural as the embroiderer could make them look. The revers of the collar are to match, but are edged with gold embroidery. Karenina, a big official assimilated to a General of Division, is proud of his wife's fine style and the well chosen richness of her toilette. Her house gown in Venice rose point is just the thing for the young wife of a multi-millionaire, who has suddenly risen in business from humble beginnings. Another déshabillé is in white mousseline de soie, with a sort of dalmatic in gold embroidered tulle thrown over it, and ornamented in the front with Italian guipure and bows of gold ribbon. Then there is a robe of green velvet, flexible and of a soft green hue. The final robe in which Anna throws herself before the train presages the winding sheet. Mme. Mégard goes to Redfern for her stage dresses, and the astonishing chic with which she wears them may have helped their designer to obtain the much-coveted red ribbon.

Tolstoy, in his novel, gives symbolical significance to the different characters. They are, homme-types and femme-types. M. Guiraud softens this symbolism and tries to make them merely men and women belonging to different sections of society.

If you are in Paris this season go to see M. Guiraud's adaptation, and be sure to stay through the drop curtain scene. It is rendered with startling realism. Those who love to sup on horrors will find a feast in the train rattling down at a 55-miles-an-hour pace, the puffs of smoke and steam marking its progress through a cutting which we do not see. They will hear the shriek of the heroine as the train is nearly on her. The illusion of the whole thing is blood-curdling. But the play lacks the deep passion of the novel. However, the beauty, grace, and dramatic talent of Mme. Mégard atone for this.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE battle-cry of Progress, dear Lady Betty, is "Advance"; which accounts for the County Councils continually raising loans.

It is frequently necessary to take a step backwards to take two forwards. The Municipal authorities very properly compel the moneyed classes to take the step backwards to enable the whole community to take the two forwards.

"Prosperity was not made for the People; it is our privilege," is the companion phrase to, "Politics were not made for the People; the People were made for politics."

"Good blood" is bad blood. That which has been transmitted through ten dukes—with their respective follies and vices, and the mental and physical defects these and luxury cause—must necessarily be hopelessly vitiated. The stock of "good blood" in a country is its criminal reserve, should circumstances develop the necessary temptations. The conditions of our time are providing the temptations, and, with increasing frequency, the possessors of "good blood," throughout the world, are figuring in disgraceful transactions. It has been calculated that the confidence reposed in "well-connected" directors has, in the last quarter of a century, cost the public as much as did the war in South Africa. It has recently been said that "we are all pickpockets at heart." There should at once be a Bacteriological Survey of the members of the Upper House; two-thirds of these would probably be condemned, and they would be replaced by wholesome self-made men. That is a scientific solution of the House of Lords difficulty.

The Sacred Sex is an ill-assorted companion to the Sacred Cat of ancient Egypt and the Sacred Monkey of India; the New Civilisation, however, appears to be developing the first. Imagine that to all her privileges woman has added all the rights of man; she is little else then than a sacred creation. As it is, every Fury claims to have the same attention as is paid to Venus.

Imagine further that the Suffragette agitation has attained its object; that thirty "gallant" constituencies have returned women candidates—the minor difficulties of the situation become at once apparent. In the chair is a bachelor Speaker, and every unmarried woman member is continually endeavouring to "catch his eye"! The Speaker is a married man, and behind the grating in the Ladies' Gallery his wife watches a flirtation which is proceeding between him and a woman member, and the inexorable rules of the House prevent her from interfering! Mr. Arthur Balfour generally rests his feet on the table at an angle of forty-five degrees; of course, such an attitude would be unbecoming were a woman member to assume it. None would, but it is another injustice to the sex that such a trifling comfort should be denied them. To every "Report of the Debate" in the newspapers would certainly be added a "Description of the Dresses." How the Radical reporters of the latter would denounce the costumes worn by the Conservatives, and how the Conservative reporters would condemn those worn by the Radicals, and how continually the House would be compelled to listen to "Personal Explanations" on the subject of depreciated chiffons! Like "The Pickwick, the Owl, and the Waverley pen," our women are a "Boon and a blessing to men," but it is conceivable that the pens, and women, in inappropriate conditions, would not be useful, and would be annoying.

"Is the Mythological Dictionary a fit book to place in the hands of the young?" is a question which will assuredly arouse the anger of most of those who maintain that a classical education is necessary to polish the mind. This dictionary is little better than an elementary guide to dissipation and divorce, yet most boys are set to study it strenuously. Many of the classics, moreover, which youth is forced to translate, are of so objectionable a character that no publisher of to-day would print one of them were a modern author the writer. Knowledge of the classics was a sign of learning in the far distant past, when few could even read or write; later, education was slightly more general, and our remote predecessors naturally valued that which those before them thought important—and we continue in the same course. Greek and Latin are, undoubtedly, most useful languages for certain purposes; they train and polish the mind, but they can be taught without the aid of the objectionable literature both possess.

from our schools, even in State examinations it is generally necessary to be intimately acquainted with the minutest details concerning the pagan religious systems of the Greeks and Romans. Is it audacious to add to these observations that it is conceivably time for the world to provide other astronomical names to replace those of Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, for instance?—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

A FRENCH correspondent informs me that M. E. Blanc has a highly promising three-year-old in his dark colt, Vichy, by Cyllene out of Vicuna, and a most successful season is expected for this animal if all goes well with him. Vichy's only engagement in England is in the Two Thousand.

Some years have now elapsed since there was a winter meeting of the members of the Jockey Club in London, but I hear that there is a prospect of one being held shortly after the opening of Parliament at Lord Derby's house in St. James's-square. There are several matters of urgent importance upon which the Stewards might most advantageously confer with the members without waiting for the first ordinary meeting of the Club during the Newmarket Craven Week.

Mr. W. Hall Walker at present has twenty-one horses in training at Foxhill, under the charge of W. T. Robinson. The stud comprises seven three-year-olds and fourteen two-year-olds. Black Arrow is not at Foxhill, as he has been under the care of Mr. Coleman, the veterinary surgeon at Epsom, during the winter. It is confidently anticipated that Black Arrow will be raced next season with satisfactory results, and a large number of engagements have recently been made for him, both in handicaps and in weight-for-age events. Polar Star will presumably be prepared for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, as the best of his very few original engagements are the Rous Memorial Stakes at Ascot, the Northern Derby at Newcastle, and the Lennox Plate of £1,500 at the Hurst Park August Meeting.

The Coronation Cup will be one of the most interesting races of the whole season if it also brings out Keystone II., Polymelus, Troutbeck, and The White Knight, as then Polar Star will be afforded an opportunity of showing whether he is really a flyer of high class, for some good judges maintain that he was indebted for his twelve victories last season, not so much to superlative merit as to pure luck in some cases, and to judicious placing in others. Polar Star lasted well as a two-year-old, for he was out during the first week of the season, when he won the Sefton Park Plate at Liverpool, and his last race was the Criterion Stakes at the Newmarket Houghton Meeting, when he defeated Galvani, winner of the Middle Park Plate, but I am assured that there were good excuses for the defeat of Major Loder's colt on that occasion. Knight of Tully is not likely to be up to Derby form, but he ought to win some good races if he is judiciously placed. A very high opinion must have been entertained of this colt when he was a yearling, as he was then entered for no fewer than forty-nine races, and he has still twenty-seven engagements in the future, the first of which is the Union Jack Stakes of £1,200 at the Liverpool Spring Meeting. Witch Elm won five races last season, and was four times beaten. If this filly trains on she ought to be a useful three-year-old. Witch Elm is entered for the One Thousand and Oaks, and for the Nassau Stakes at Goodwood, and the Park Hill Stakes at Doncaster. Mr. Hall Walker's two-year-olds do not include relatives to Black Arrow or Polar Star, but Royal Realm is own brother to Colonia, who has, I hear, been relegated to the stud. Twelve months ago it was generally expected that this mare would win either the One Thousand or the Oaks, but she only started once as a three-year-old, which was at the Newbury Spring Meeting, and then she was well beaten. White Eagle is a colt by Gallinule out of Merry Gal, and there are four other two-year-olds sired by Gallinule, and five by Count Schomberg.

Mr. Dugdale's horse Picton has not been seen out since he finished second to Spearmint for the Derby, as he could not be trained on the hard ground last summer, so he was wisely thrown up for the season. It is hoped that Picton will get through a preparation for some of his four-year-old engagements. He has accepted for the Lincolnshire Handicap and for the Queen's Prize at the Kempton Park Easter Meeting. He is entered for the Rous Memorial Stakes at Ascot, and as he did not win anything last season, he would have no extra weight to carry in that race.

A number of papers announced on Friday that on the previous day there had been a sale of "racing trophies" at Debenham and Storr's, one of these being the Goodwood Cup of 1883, which is stated to have been won by Sir George Chetwynd's Border Minstrel, who defeated both Corrie Roy and Dutch Oven. As a matter of fact, Border Minstrel belonged to the late Sir Robert Jardine, and he was never owned by Sir George Chetwynd. It is certainly remarkable that any "sporting trophy" should have ignominiously come into the market which had been won by so rich a man as the late Sir Robert Jardine, but I suppose he had given away the cup.

The Stewards of the Jockey Club have given leave for horses belonging to the Prussian Royal stud to run in the name of Count Lehndorff, whose colours are black and white stripes, with black cap. I suppose it is intended to start one or both of the two-year-olds, which have been sent to England to be trained, at Ascot, as they have been engaged in the Coventry Stakes and in the Windsor Castle Stakes. They are in Darling's stable at Beckhampton. The one colt is sired by Ard Patrick and the other by Saraband. Count Lehndorff has been a familiar figure at Newmarket for nearly forty years, and he has been a generous bidder at many of the most important sales which have been held during that period. He has acted as commissioner for the Prussian Royal stud and for the Prussian Government both in England and in France, and he has made many judicious purchases, but there is something in the air or soil (or both) of North Germany which appears to act against the successful breeding of high-class thoroughbred stock. The late Lord Falmouth always kept his stud in Kent, as it was his firm opinion that it would be impossible to breed in Cornwall with satisfactory results. One of the earliest and most remarkable purchases made by Count Lehndorff was The Colonel, who had twice won the Grand National Steeplechase. The Emperor William I. rode this horse as a charger during the earlier stages of the war of 1870-71.

I hear that his Majesty's horse Nulli Secundus is in reserve for the Newbury Meeting, and that he is intended to run for the Spring Hurdle Race of £500 on Friday, the 22nd. It is quite likely that the King will pay his first visit to the new racecourse at Newbury on the 22nd. His Majesty had intended to go down on the second day of the autumn meeting, but he gave up the expedition when it became clear that Slim Lad had no chance of winning the Berkshire Foal Stakes.

An excellent judge of racing, who is thoroughly acquainted with both the English and the French form, informs me that he is decidedly of the opinion that Maintenon will win the Ascot Cup if he goes on all right. I do not believe that there is any real prospect of Spearmint getting through a preparation for the Gold Cup, and as Polymelus certainly could not stay the course, Maintenon appears to hold the older horses safe enough, for Keystone II. will also lack the stamina which is indispensable for success in this race. The most hopeful English candidate is Sagamore. Lord Rosebery, who is particularly anxious to win the Ascot Cup, has engaged Ramrod, Donna Caterina, and Bezonian, of which lot the four-year-olds will be hopelessy outclassed, while the three-year-old will no doubt have started for the Two Thousand and Derby. I shall be vastly surprised if Polar Star turns out to be a good stayer, but it was prudent to enter him for this race, as the field for the Gold Cup so often collapses altogether at the finish.

Lord Derby's Boulter's Lock, who is half-brother, by St. Frusquin, to Keystone II., ran three times last season without winning, but he is apparently expected to do better as a three-year-old, for he has been entered in several of the races which have recently closed. I do not suppose, however, that he is likely to "come on" to the same satisfactory extent as last year's Oaks winner.

The National Hunt Steeplechase is to be run at Warwick on March 7. There are two races thus named, one, value £1,000, for five-year-olds and upwards; the other, value £500, for four-year-olds only. Seventy-five entries have been obtained for the more valuable of the two events, and thirty-eight for the other race. Mr. J. E. Stevens's Port Light II. has been beaten three times for the National Hunt Steeplechase, finishing second to Timothy Titus at Cheltenham in 1904, while in 1905, over the same course, he refused, and last year, at Warwick, he ran second to Count Rufus. Mr. H. G. Farrant's Red Hall and Mr. S. Park's Glenrex have been twice beaten for this race. Mr. F. Keene's Prophet III. is a very likely sort of horse to win the National Hunt Steeplechase, and he will be more at home in the Warwick race than he would be if he was reserved for the Grand National Steeplechase.

The acceptances for the Spring Handicaps are very large indeed. It was quite certain that Polymelus would be withdrawn from the Lincolnshire Handicap, for, as I stated last week, it would have been utterly impossible to get the horse fit in another six weeks. I do not believe that Polymelus will be started for either the City and Suburban or the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap, although he has been left in for both those races. It is much more likely that Mr. Joel will reserve him for the Coronation Cup at Epsom and the Princess of Wales's Stakes at the Newmarket First July Meeting.

His Eminence has accepted for both the Lincolnshire Handicap and the City and Suburban, and if he starts for the race of March 19, I shall certainly expect him to defeat Kaffir Chief, who is a very moderate horse, although a herd of mooncalves have been so infatuated as to "rush" him for the Lincoln race. His Eminence has nice speed, and, although he is deficient in stamina, I fancy he would be able to stay the Lincoln mile, but it is quite on the cards that he may be reserved for the City and Suburban, and in my opinion the Epsom course would just suit him. Earla Mor has accepted at Lincoln, Epsom, and Kempton Park, but this horse appears to be everywhere overweighted.

Minos has been backed at a ridiculously short price, and those who fancy this horse had better leave him alone for the present, as he is very backward, and it is quite likely that he will not be properly fit at the opening of the season. It will not surprise me if Minos is kept for the City and Suburban.

Camisard has been thrown in at Lincoln with a truly contemptuous lenity, for 7 st. is a feather weight for a five-year-old which has shown respectable form. Camisard is a tip among the doodles and noodles who maintain that he ran faster than anything in the Cambridgeshire for a mile. The fact is that this is all balderdash, for directly the rider of Polymelus called upon his horse, the race was over. Camisard will be fit to run at Lincoln, and he has certainly been given a wonderful chance.

The other French candidates are Ob, who won last year, and Champ d'Or, who also belongs to M. Ephrussi. I do not for a moment believe that Ob can win with 8 st. 10 lb., for last year, with 8 st. on his back, he only just won by a head, after a desperate finish with Dean Swift, to whom he was giving 3 lb. These two are handicapped very closely on that form, Ob having now to give 4 lb. Last year Dean Swift won the City and Suburban easily with 7 st. 11 lb. on his back, and he afterwards carried off the Trial Stakes at Ascot. Ob only ran once in England after Lincoln, which was in the Newbury Spring Cup, when he finished nowhere, and his collapse was to be expected, inasmuch as he was carrying the same weight as Thrush, who finished third, and he was giving 5 lb. to Roseate Dawn, who was placed second, while he had 17 lb. the worst of the weights with Succory, who won. Ob did not start in France last year, and his only race on the Continent was the Baden Foundation Prize in August, when he finished second to Phœnix.

Champ d'Or was unplaced last October for the Duke of York Handicap at Kempton Park, Polymelus being the winner, and the French horse carried 8 st. 3 lb. In May Champ d'Or finished second to Brat for the Biennial at Maisons Laffitte, and in August he easily won the Grand Handicap de Deauville, distance one mile, defeating a field of fourteen. His only other race was the Grand Prize of Baden, in which he ran badly. Champ d'Or, with 8 st. on his back, appears to me to be a very much more promising candidate than Ob with 8 st. 10 lb.

Lord Derby is quite likely to be very dangerous in the Chester Cup, as he has accepted with both Bridge of Canny (8 st. 5 lb.) and Gourd (7 st. 9 lb.). The mare is particularly well in, but the ground must be soft for her to give her best running.

Velocity now heads the Lincoln list, and he has also accepted for the City and Suburban and for the Jubilee Handicap. Velocity was backed for a lot of money last year by impetuous ganders who were in ignorance of the fact that he was exceedingly backward, and the Irish horse was not in proper racing trim until more than two months later in the season, when he won the Castle Irwell Handicap at the Manchester Whitsuntide Meeting. Velocity is not an early spring horse, and I shall be astonished if he runs at Lincoln. So far as "class" is concerned he is now, of course, the best animal in the race.

M. Caillault's Tyrol is a mysterious tip for the Newbury Spring Cup, and this horse, being four years old, is certainly not overweighted with 7 st. 2 lb. Last season Tyrol started seven times without winning, and he never ran at two years old.

The newly published volume of the Racing Calendar gives some interesting statistics as to the events of last season. There were 1,753 races in Great Britain during 1906, as against 1,697 in 1905. There were thirty-four races of over two miles and under three, 457 of over one mile and under two, 308 of one mile, 316 of from six furlongs to one mile, 572 of five furlongs and under six, and sixty-six of four furlongs and under five. Of the races of six furlongs and under a mile, sixty-six were for two-year-olds only, and 224 of those of five furlongs and under six were scrambles for three-year-olds and upwards. It would be a most valuable reform to prohibit all races of under six furlongs for the older horses. Let these events be reserved for two-year-olds.

The value of the stakes run for during 1906 was £356,302 in England, £21,430 in Ireland, and £11,548 in Scotland. It would be interesting to learn how much of this money was really contributed by the owners in the forms of entrances and forfeits.

Until within the last few years the minor forfeits for the Derby and the Oaks were declared by the first Tuesday in January. The date of declaration has been postponed until the last Tuesday in March, with the result that the withdrawals from those races have been very much larger than formerly. A considerable sum has now to be added to both stakes in order to make up the advertised value, whereas under the old arrangement there was frequently a surplus, and the deficit (if any) was very small. Last year the Epsom fund was drawn upon for £1,870 on account of the Derby, and for £985 to complete the endowment of the Oaks. In 1905 the deficiencies were £2,095 and £1,510 respectively, and in 1904 they amounted to £4,205!

The rich subscription stakes all did badly last year. At Newmarket there was a loss of £4,449 over the Princess of Wales's Stakes, and of £725 over the Jockey Club Stakes. At Sandown Park the Eclipse Stakes. cost the fund £1,431, and there was a loss of £665 over the National Breeders' Produce Stakes of £5,000.

The Newmarket events did badly also in 1905, there being a loss of £2,569 over the Princess of Wales's Stakes, and of £1,382 over the Jockey Club Stakes. At Sandown Park the Eclipse Stakes cost the fund £1,250, and there was a deficit of £1,218 over the National Breeders' Produce Stakes.

In 1904 the Princess of Wales's Stakes cost the Jockey Club £2,366, but the deficit over the Jockey Club Stakes was only £74. As to Sandown Park, the Eclipse Stakes involved a loss of £1,067, and the two-year old race cost the fund £232.

Of course, the hideous losses over the Princess of Wales's Stakes (without any compensation in the form of a really good race) were due to the muddy-minded imbecility of the authorities in excluding three-year-olds from that race, in deference to a clamour raised by a few sighing simpletons and visionaries.

TIDEWAY ROWING.

Imagine a man, who, if he had been at the University, would have been good enough to get his Blue—a man of the stamp that makes a first-class president and college first boat captain; picture him attached to a metropolitan boat club, and then you have some notion of the zeal and enthusiasm that a certain tideway veteran displays for the Thames Rowing Club in particular and metropolitan oarsmanship in general. The recent dinners of the Thames and London Rowing Clubs have brought the question of tideway rowing into prominence. Fortunately, the wash of the London County Council steamers has been done away with. That troubles the river no higher up than Chelsea. At Putney there are boathouses and boats. There are a certain number of coaches but there are not enough men. I cannot make out why there is this dearth of material. It is said golf, lawn tennis, and motoring, football, and hockey, dry up the sources of supply. But this can scarcely be the case bearing in mind the increase of population. From a district within two miles of Putney Bridge it should be possible to get at the very least five eights both for Thames and London. A similar observation applies to Kingston, with all the Surbiton district at its back, and then Molesey has a fine area from which to draw. It is surprising that there is no club at Richmond, with its splendid stretch of water. "Now what is the reason, I pray?" as the young man said to old Father William. First of all, there are very few schools which have opportunities for rowing. If a boy who has not played football, hockey, or cricket goes up to the Universities he is drafted to the river. If he comes up to town, there is no boat captain to take hold of him, and he drifts on and does nothing, or else he takes up golf. At public schools nowadays, as contrasted with the early days of the seventies, athletics are much more specialised. Even if they have not got their school colours the majority of young fellows are sure to find places in some of the many cricket and football clubs round London. They have no inducement to take up a new form of sport and go through the drudgery that rowing entails. The boy who has made no mark in school sports has no one to give him a helping hand and to urge him to the pleasures of the river. If a young fellow coming up to town had the chance, I believe he would often take up rowing. In the leading metropolitan clubs he will find as nice a set of men as he could wish to meet. Andrew Lang, in one of his essays, describes the rowing men as being the salt of the college, and it might well be said that of sports in the metropolis the oarsmen are the salt. Mr. Etherington-Smith, the captain of Leander, pointed out at the Thames Club dinner that rowing men always stick together in after life. This is very true. He did not mean that it was only Leander men who clung together. There is a brotherhood among amateur oarsmen in the metropolis which is stronger than freemasonry. Their definition of amateurism is as illogical as it is practical. It may work hardships, but its advantages overweigh any such considerations. In rowing, sport is sport for its own sake more than in any other branch of sport. There is the period of self-denial and training that helps to bring men together; there is the race in which defeat is often scarcely less glorious than victory. There is no one man to win the match by brilliant batting or bowling, splendid shooting at goal, or a fine run that gets the try. In the crew each man has to bear his share. Ideal socialism if you will, each for all and all for each.

Now the difficulty is to get hold of the men. At practically every public school several of the masters have probably rowed in one of their college boats. At all events, they will know enough of rowing to be able to spot the boy who would have done good work for his college if he had been going up to a university. It is not too much to suggest that these masters should take an interest in the boy when he is leaving school and put him on to one or other of the best metropolitan clubs. Within my own experience, I have often been asked which is the best place for a youngster to go to live at when he is first starting his work in London. Such a question must often be put to a master when a boy is leaving school. Unfortunately, the majority of these masters have little or no knowledge of the status of these metropolitan clubs. If they realised the social openings that are there offered to young men, the immediate introductions and friendships that are possible, they would, I am sure, send them on to these clubs, and I know that there is not a boat captain who on such an introduction would not do his best to make things pleasant for the new comer. If boat captains can get in touch with the schoolmaster, they may be able to tap, regularly, an excellent source of supply. My idea is not quite scatterbrained. It can be carried out with little difficulty, and would afford to many parents and guardians the knowledge that young fellows were not being left to their own resources when first coming to town. There would be more than sufficient return for the entrance fees and subscriptions in the advantages that the youngster will obtain. I know that with regard to metropolitan rowing there is an idea that men cannot get to the top of the tree unless they have been to the University. This is all nonsense. Henley certainly looms very largely in the public eye; but the rowing men alone realise the excellent racing that there is at other regattas and amongst the members of the club itself. Besides, there is absolutely no reason why Thames and London should not do as well at Henley as they did twenty years ago. It is all a question of getting material and of working it up. That is naturally a lengthy process, but it can be done, and I believe it is being done. I have indicated a method by which useful material may be obtained. Then there is the question of the University man. He comes from college and gets his first boat seat, and turns out some man who has struggled up. But such cases will become fewer as the standard of metropolitan rowing goes up. Even the college oar does not support the tideway as he ought. A little while ago I had a talk with a first boat captain from Cambridge. His one regret is that he did not take to metropolitan rowing before he came down. He said the men in those crews knew what could not be taught on the narrow waters of the Cam, and that was how to race. There is all the difference in the world between a bumping or time race, and the race where you are alongside your opponent at the start. In opportunities for learning watermanship and the art of racing, the metropolitan oarsman has the advantage. He may lack the long tubbing on fixed seats, but he makes up for this by much longer practice in the summer months. Of course, his difficulties in the way of training are much greater than those of the man who is up at College. But the men of twenty and thirty years ago triumphed over these troubles. There were no cycles and motor 'buses then. They laid themselves out to get hard and fit, and row themselves out. That was the secret of their success, and that was why, as Mr. Eyre, the Chairman at the Thames Club dinner, said, light crews often beat a heavier one; and, with a tithe of that veteran's enthusiasm, the men of the present day could lift Thames rowing once again to the top of the tree.

Those who have been cycling over flinty roads this frosty weather may have been troubled with small punctures. Here is a hint that may be an old one, but is new to me—namely, to insert a length of wide lamp-wick between the outer and inner tube. It is tough stuff, and takes the small flint points that are such a nuisance.

The second round of the Association Cup has been played, and the South has not come out of the ordeal at all satisfactorily. There were no dramatic surprises like the victory of Crystal Palace over Newcastle United. In fact, the Palace drew with Fulham. The unexpected results were the victory of Brentford, who were playing at home, over Middlesbrough, and the failure of Portsmouth to account for Barnsley. Southampton and Luton were playing at home against Sheffield Wednesday and Sunderland, and they could only draw their games. West Ham put up a very hard fight with Everton, the holders of the cup. For the first time in two years Everton were playing away from home in a cup tie.

As an indication of the extent to which all football is being levelled up, it is interesting to note that in the sixteen games played only twenty-eight goals were scored. Bolton Wanderers, with two goals to nothing against Aston Villa, and Bristol Rovers, with a score of two goals to love against Millwall, were the only clubs that had more than a one-goal margin, and in only two other matches did the winners score two goals. These clubs were Woolwich Arsenal and Everton.

Scotland has beaten Wales at Rugby by two tries to a penalty goal. The Welshmen were playing the New Zealand formation. For the last twenty minutes of the game they lost Winfield at full back. Gibbs, the extra half, then took up that position, and for the first time in the game was really useful. Of course, this change did not affect the forward formation. For Scotland, Purves and Macgregor made a good pair at three-quarters, but MacLeod was a comparative failure. The English forward line has been reorganised against Ireland. There will be no quaint conceits of strategy and tactics. The forwards are a good fast lot, and now that the three-quarter line has been reorganised, I quite expect England to do well in the next two International matches.

There was a most interesting billiard match between Stevenson and Diggle, who had a thousand points start. The former won by just about 700 points, after a game marked by two big breaks. Diggle cut his record by a break of 673, Stevenson on the previous day having made 599.

Markets Still Unsettled—Further Liquidation of Americans—Why the Fall is Likely to go Further—Sharp Advance in Russian Bonds—The New Loan almost at "Par"—Home Securities Still Neglected—A "Bear" Account in Consols—Monetary Prospects—New York takes Gold from London.

THE baneful influence of the American market is still felt throughout the Stock Exchange. All last week Yankees were steadily pressed for sale, and values tumbled away rapidly, with very few intermittent rallies. Prices in this market have since December already undergone a fairly substantial decline, but most indications point to the end not being reached yet. In view of the enormous amount of new capital sought to be placed on the part of American railroads and other leading corporations, and the fact that the finance houses on the other side have already got quite as much scrip as they can accommodate, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that a radical readjustment of values will have to take place before existing stocks can tempt the investing public. This great unsatisfied cry for new capital seems to me to be the dominating factor for the American market, though there are other "Bear" points of no small importance, such, for instance, as the advance in the cost of labour and materials, the growth of the political agitation against the Trusts, and the investigation by the Inter-State Commerce Commission into the Harriman roads. Under such circumstances it is necessary to speak with caution about the outlook for the stock markets as a whole. Any further upheavals in Yankees can hardly fail to affect other departments, though if the further liquidation that seems inevitable be conducted without any severe straining of the credit machine, it may be that the House as a whole will seek to detach itself from the troubles of Shorters-court. Certainly most other considerations that weigh with the Stock Exchange are of a favourable character. The horizon of international politics is clearer than it has been for a long time past. It is true that last week some wild rumours were circulating in America to the effect that President Roosevelt, discussing the question of Japanese children in Californian schools, had declared that Japan wanted war and was seeking for a pretext for its prosecution, but in view of Mr. Roosevelt's recent graceful tribute to Japan and the expressions of satisfaction that his conciliatory message called forth at Tokio, such stories, pending confirmation, may well be put down to the vivid imagination of the American journalist. On the Continent, the success of the Imperialist Party and the rebuff given to the Socialists at the German State Elections appear to have produced a good feeling upon the Bourses, French capitalists apparently being quite as relieved at the latter event as those in the Fatherland. The feature among Foreign Government bonds has been the buoyancy of Russians. A good effect was produced by the official statement that no foreign loan is contemplated during 1907 by the Ministry of Finance, while some people were inclined to attach significance to the fact that a well-known Jewish house in London has identified itself with the Russian Famine Relief Fund. It was argued from this that better relations were being established between the Israelite financial community and the Russian Government—a matter which, without doubt, has an important bearing upon the market for Russian securities. The new 5 per cent. loan which has just become fully paid spurted to within a fraction of "par"—that is, 89—and it has thus recovered already fully 11 points from the lowest of last year. Some of the leading dealers think the rise is not over yet. Coming to markets with which London is more directly concerned, it cannot be said that Home Rails have derived much benefit from the half-yearly dividend declarations, favourable as these have been on the whole. For the most part, indeed, values have undergone a further shrinkage, owing to the action of a few stale "Bulls" who offered stock on discovering what a small effect the dividends had upon the public. Consols and the gilt-edged group generally have remained in a state of utter neglect, although the market for Goschens was steadied by the discovery at the monthly carry-over last week of a "Bear" account, some operators, it is said, having sold short of Consols as a "hedge" against commitments open in the Yankee section. It is so far satisfactory to note that the fortnightly Account in general securities completed last Thursday brought to light no serious trouble. Two failures were announced, but in both cases the liabilities were relatively insignificant. The open account, too, proved to have been materially reduced, and money for continuation purposes was fully 1 per cent. cheaper than a fortnight previous. As to the prospect of any further material reduction in money rates, it would be well for the present not to be over sanguine. It is true that the Bank of England has recently shown a distinct improvement in its position, and that the reserve, according to the last return, is more than two millions ahead of the total of a year ago, when the Bank rate was 4 per cent., as compared with the 5 per cent. official minimum now ruling, but merely to compare current figures with those of a twelvemonth back, and then to argue—as some superficial critics are doing—that a 4 per cent. Bank rate is justified, can only be described as dangerous reasoning. During the last few days a demand has sprung up here for gold on United States account, London having apparently given New York the power to draw upon her by purchases of Railroad short term notes. Should this gold export movement continue, as is not unlikely, it will almost certainly postpone the establishment of a lower Bank rate.

Depressed Home Rails—Talk of a Freight Commission to Reduce Tariffs—Midland and Great Northern Dividends Below Expectation—Three Prosperous Mineral Carriers—The Hull, Furness and Taff Vale—Points from Recent Reports.

The Home Railway dividend season has now almost run its course, the story being completed this week by the announcements of the Great Western and London and North-Western, due to-day and to-morrow respectively. It cannot be said that the declarations made last week did anything to lift the market out of the rut of depression into which it has drifted. The best estimates, it is true, were not fulfilled, but the dividends were not in themselves really unsatisfactory. The fact is that the Home Railway market is still under the ban of unpopularity, brought on by the almost unbroken declines registered in prices for nearly a decade, and in consequence it is much easier to gain credit for adverse reports than to persuade the public that there is anything good about stocks. The depression of last week was deepened by some forced closing of accounts, and by the rise announced in the price of coal, not to mention a story that Mr. Lloyd George means to follow up the reforms effected in the Consular Service by reforms in railway rates for the carriage of produce, and that a Freight Commission is to be established as a preliminary to legislative action. The course of quotations is shown in the following table:—

There was at one time a spurt in Metropolitan, but apparently it was due to nothing more than a little "Bear" closing, and the price later fell back without resistance. Of the dividends declared last week, let me mention first that of the Midland. This Company was content to just maintain the 1905 rate of 2¾ per cent. upon the Deferred stock; another ¼ per cent. could have been distributed, but the Board chose instead to strengthen its position by raising the carry-forward from £56,000 to nearly £82,000. A few years ago the Midland was blamed, and not altogether without reason, for being niggardly in the matter of allowances out of revenue upon the general maintenance of the road. During the last two years it has pursued a distinctly more conservative policy, the provision made out of revenue for maintenance of way, locomotive, carriage and waggon repairs and renewals, having been sensibly increased. The decision now to pouch money rather than divide up to the hilt is, therefore, not a matter of much surprise. Speculators may feel disappointment, but the Board's policy, of course, is all in favour of the stock as an investment; it is clear now that the Chairman was guilty of no idle talk when he said rather more than a year ago that attempts were being made to equalise dividends. The Great Northern dividend also came as a disappointment to the market—in fact, the effect upon York Deferred was rather marked, because this was one of the few Home Railway stocks that had lately received attention at the hands of speculators. The rate declared was 1¾ per cent. for the year on the Deferred, against 1½ per cent. for 1905. This was after making provision for the Grantham accident, and placing £10,000 to contingency fund; the carry-forward, too, was increased by £5,000. Seeing that the Board brought into the half-year an extra sum sufficient alone to pay ½ per cent. on the Deferred, it had been hoped that the dividend would be raised from 1½ to 2 per cent. The accident had not been lost sight of by the market, which had reckoned that due provision could be made out of the published increase in gross receipts of £52,000. Moreover, the market was not out in its calculation, for the amount placed to contingency fund, plus the additional sums carried forward, just equalled the total required to give the other ¼ per cent. that had been anticipated. The Directors' decision, while it, of course, strengthens the position of the Preferred holders, rather modifies what has been said about the Deferred. At the same time, seeing that the latter stock gives a yield of 4 per cent., allowing for accrued interest, it is hardly over-valued—that is, remembering the big discount at which it stands and the bright possibilities for the current year. There is no need to speak in qualified terms about the dividend declared by the Hull and Barnsley. This little "coaler" line has been making steady headway for some years, as the following dividend record shows:—1902, ½ per cent.; 1903, 1 per cent.; 1904, 1¼ per cent.; 1905, 1⅜ per cent. The distribution just recommended in respect of 1906 is 2¼ per cent., which is the best ever paid, and makes the return on the stock, allowing for accrued dividend, 4¾ per cent. It may be argued that the yield upon the stock of a railway depending upon the vagaries of the mineral trade should be more liberal than in the case of a line whose interests are spread, but 4¾ per cent. is none the less an attractive return, particularly as the coal trade seems to be in for another busy year. Another mineral carrier that has done well is the Furness Railway, which is paying at the rate of 3¾ per cent. per annum for the half-year, as against 3 per cent. for the corresponding period, which makes the dividend for the year 3 per cent., as compared with only 1⅞ per cent. for 1905. This dividend is the best since 1900, and at the present price of about 66 "cum div." Furness Ordinary yields 4⅝ per cent. Following up the track of high-yielding stocks I come to Taff Vale Ordinary. Allowing for increased amounts set aside, the Taff Vale earned nearly 4½ per cent. last year. It is paying 4 per cent. for the twelvemonth as compared with 3⅞ per cent. for 1904 and 1905, and at the current price of just over 80 the Ordinary stock returns a full 5 per cent. Under such circumstances it is surprising that "Taffs" are not more sought after. Can it be that the market is seriously afraid of the injury that may be caused to the Taff Vale through the newly-constructed dock and railway of the Cardiff Company? Among recently issued Railway reports there are one or two features deserving of comment. The Lancashire and Yorkshire's gain in gross receipts of £97,500 is specially encouraging by reason of the fact that £54,000 of the increase was contributed by passenger receipts. It thus appears that the loss in coaching revenue occasioned by tramway competition has been definitely arrested. Another welcome feature is that of the advance of £57,000 in net profit, no less than £51,000 goes to the Ordinary stockholders in the form of an additional ½ per cent., the Company not having mortgaged its prospects by material additions to fixed charges. The Great Central report makes clear why the Company, in face of an advance of £40,000 in net receipts, had £6,000 less available for distribution. I referred last week to the heavy burden that had been thrown upon the Company by the new Great Western-Great Central joint line, which was opened last April. This line was constructed with funds furnished solely by the Great Western, but since its opening the Great Central has had to provide 3½ per cent. interest on its share of the cost. The total interest so paid last half-year was £22,658, against which the sum to be set as its share of the net revenue of the Great Western and Great Central Joint Committee was only £13,000. Another charge arising from the opening of the new line was a rental of £10,000 for the half-year, payable to the Metropolitan for the Canfield Place to Harrow section, whilst £15,600 was set down in the accounts as rent due to the Great Central and Midland Joint Committee, and £18,000 figured as interest on new Debenture stock, making together no less than £53,000 of new obligations. While admitting that there is plenty of scope for development in the Great Central system, extended as it has been of recent years, I would commend the half-year's figures to those who have been glibly talking about the early resumption of the full dividend on the 1894 Preference, and even of a payment on the Ordinary. It will take another £78,000 net before the 1891 issue gets in full, while £155,000 on top of that is wanted to pay the 5 per cent. on the 1894 Preference, or £233,000 in all. The North-Eastern report tends to enhance rather than diminish the good effect produced by the dividend. The advance in gross receipts was £275,000, of which £142,000 was saved in net. Working expenses were relatively lighter, the ratio being reduced from 62.51 per cent. to 61.77 per cent., and a noteworthy feature was the substantial decline of £9,500 in rates and taxes. In the South-Western's report there are two rather striking points: while the total gross receipts rose by £20,400, the whole of this and more was derived from passenger traffic. Goods and minerals actually showed a decline of nearly £18,000. Again, instead of any portion of the advance in gross takings going to swell the available balance, the whole of it and £6,600 more has been swallowed up in increased working expenditure. The outcome has been that the Board, besides reducing the dividend by ¼ per cent. in order to set aside the £30,000 considered necessary to meet claims arising out of the Salisbury accident, has had to reduce the appropriation to steamboat renewals—only £15,000 being put to that fund as against £25,000 a year ago.

Another Severe Fall in Yankees—A "Bear" Carnival—Support from Banking Interests only Temporarily Arrests the Fall—Heavy New Issues by the New York Central and Atchison—Erie a Prospective Borrower—The Question of Higher Wages and Dear Materials.

Except for one brief interval, the American market throughout last week was in a state of acute weakness. This department, unlike many other sections of the Stock Exchange, is seldom seen in a passive mood; the restless energy of Wall Street, if it cannot be turned to profitable account on the "Bull" tack, is readily directed, and with no less effect, in the opposite direction. Perhaps the surprising feature of last week's movement was the unanimity with which the market acted; despite the understanding that a considerable account for the fall had been established, very little retaliation was offered to the "Bears," and it was not until Thursday, when the market showed signs of getting out of hand, that any strong buyers came forward. The rally which occurred on this occasion appeared to be concerted action taken by the banking interests, amongst which the Morgan and Kuhn Loeb division were prominent, decided upon in self-defence. Stocks, it was said, were bought indiscriminately, and the broadside thus delivered drove "Bears" to cover, and turned values sharply upward. London next morning rather readily responded to New York's lead—not because dealers here thought the tide had finally turned, but because it was felt that, after such a severe shake out, the balance of probability favoured a temporary recovery; in fact, the general feeling was that a rally was overdue. London, however, had once again been misled—dealers on this side grumblingly assert that they are always in the wrong if they attempt to get ahead of Wall Street—and on Friday prices broke with a violence that promptly neutralised the improvement of the previous day. Many leading stocks made new low records for the current year. To what extent prices have already declined from the highest of 1906 may be seen from the following table, which also shows the drop on the week:—

Perhaps the outstanding factor of disturbance was the continuance of new capital announcements. When, on January 22, the New York Central management made known that it had been decided to curtail any new construction, pending an improvement in the financial situation, a section of the market jumped to the conclusion that a halt was to be called in the matter of fresh borrowings not only on the part of the New York Central, but of other leading railroads as well. Only four days later came the sequel in the issue on behalf of the New York Central group of $50,000,000 Three-year Five per Cent. notes on terms that appear to have given the lenders nearly 6 per cent. The market naturally received a shock, and it has since received others in the shape of an issue by the Atchison of $98,000,000 Convertible bonds, and reports of a contemplated note issue by the Erie, without mentioning the $40,000,000 of Four per Cent. Convertible bonds offered on behalf of the American Telephone Company. The New York Central's announcement suggests two important considerations for the market. In the first place, the fact that so influential a group as the Vanderbilt is compelled to raise money upon short term notes, and to pay nearly 6 per cent. for its accommodation, throws a dry light upon the present glutted condition of the market for American securities, and leaves one wondering how the smaller fry among the railroads are to fare when they "take round the hat." In the second place, the raising of money on such onerous terms indicates that, much as it may be desired to postpone borrowing to a more propitious season, the demand for capital to provide for the growth of traffic is imperative. The knowledge is not rendered the more palatable by the fact that new construction and equipment undertaken now must be an unusually costly matter, quite apart from the terms on which the capital be raised. Railroad material is now fetching the highest prices for a generation, and labour is not only extremely dear, but extremely hard to get. The Western Pacific road, now under construction by the Gould system, is said to be paying common labourers $3 per day, and cannot get enough even at that price. The rolling-stock now being ordered by the Companies is of a much more expensive (though efficient) kind than of ten years ago. Freight cars, costing $800 and $900 apiece, are being used in place of cars that cost $450 and $500 a few years ago, and locomotives at from $15,000 to $20,000 replace those which then cost $10,000 to $12,000. The wages question, of course, affects the ordinary expenditure of the railways even more seriously than outlays of a special character. Recently a number of the big Companies have acceded more than once to the demands of their men for higher rates of pay, and, according to one published estimate, the increase in the wages bill of the railroads this year will average no less than 8 per cent. Attempts to counteract the effect of increased expenses by an advance in transport rates are not likely to meet with much success in the present temper of the public. On the contrary, Government action is tending in the direction of reduced rates, while the taxes of the roads are being materially increased. Many of the States are imposing penalties for delays in the forwarding of freight within State borders, and the National Legislature is pondering on the advisability of subjecting the carriers to similar fines and penalties on Inter-State shipments. If, hampered by all these disabilities, the magnates are able to organise an early resumption of the "Bull" campaign, then they must possess even more power to arrest the action of natural laws than is usually credited to them. For some years the market has dwelt almost alone upon the theme of abounding trade prosperity; it is now discovering that booming trade involves penalties as well as blessings.

THE SLUMP IN CANADAS—A DROP OF 11¼ ON THE ACCOUNT—EARNINGS AND SNOWSTORMS—THE OUTLOOK—ARGENTINE RAILS AND THEIR YIELDS—THE ROSARIO STRIKE AT AN END—POINTS ABOUT LEOPOLDINAS.

Although moving less widely than in the preceding week, Canadian Pacifics have continued in an unsettled state, the amount of "Bear" repurchasing and investment support given not being equal to check a further flood of stale "Bull" liquidation. Operators for the fall in Canadas have been enjoying a boom time lately, for not only have they claimed a contango of from ½ to ⅝ at each of the last half-dozen settlements, but in respect of the past account they had the respectable little difference to collect of 11¼ per cent. The task of the "Bulls" in getting out was scarcely facilitated by the publication of the Company's revenue statement for December, which, like that for the previous month, showed a slight falling off in net earnings. Gross receipts registered an increase of $373,000, but there was an advance in working expenses of no less than $454,000, net revenue consequently being $81,000 down. The Company issued no explanation of the falling-off, but there is little doubt that both the comparatively small gain in gross receipts and the large advance in outgoings were due to bad weather, the winter in the north-west of the Dominion having set in early, and with unusual severity. Confirmation of this assertion may be found in the revenue statement for the same month published by the Canadian Northern. The latter Company's gross increase of $98,400 was converted into a net decrease of $13,800, and an official footnote to the return stated that "the decrease in the amount of the net earnings is due to an increase in the operating expenses by reason of heavy and continuous snowstorms." Probably another factor that has contributed to raise working costs is the shortage of cars from which the Canadian Pacific, in common with the other leading lines in the Dominion, is suffering. Recent advices from the other side state that a general grain blockade is on, and has been on for months. The railways, in fact, are for the present unable to keep pace with the rapid growth in the traffic they are called upon to handle. The Canadian Pacific has large orders on hand for cars, but here again it is having to pay the penalty that attaches to abnormal trade prosperity, for, as I mentioned last week when contradicting the story about a fresh issue of capital, the greatest trouble is being experienced in securing the necessary men and materials. At a time like this, when the drop in the shares is apt to shake the faith of nervous holders, it is desirable to give prominence to the many evidences still afforded of the vitality of Canadian commerce and industry, and to emphasise the temporary character of the recent setback in railroad net earnings. What investors need to recognise is that the setback in the shares is almost entirely due to financial conditions in the stock market—which has had a bad fit of indigestion, from which it has possibly not yet recovered—and that there is no question of diminished confidence in the outlook for the Company. In spite of the indifferent results for November and December, the Canadian Pacific shows an addition to its net earnings since July 1 of $2,399,000, which is handsome enough after allowing for additional mileage. Including the 1 per cent. which will be paid this year out of the proceeds of land sales, the shares are already on a 7 per cent. basis, and prospects point to a higher rate of distribution in the not very distant future. Turning to Foreign Rails, it was perhaps too much to expect anything startling in the way of price appreciation last week, considering the upheaval in the American department, but underlying conditions, as reflected by traffics and crop advices, continue distinctly good, and afford ground for the belief that this section will be among the first to respond to any improvement in the general Stock Exchange atmosphere. How prices of both Colonial and Foreign Rails have moved during the week, and how current values compare with the extremes touched last year, may be seen from the following table:—

The little cloud upon the Argentine horizon in the shape of strikes at Rosario and Santa Fé has now passed, the trouble, as expected, never having developed to serious proportions. Meanwhile, there is no sign of slackening in the rate of traffic increases upon the leading lines, and, seeing that stocks like Buenos Ayres Great Southerns, B.A. Westerns, Pacifics and Rosarios can be bought to give a return of 5⅜ per cent. to 5⅝ per cent., it requires no special pleading to establish their cheapness. The Buenos Ayres and Rosario has just announced an issue of 176,000 new shares of £10 each to be afterwards converted into Ordinary stock. The new shares are offered at par to holders of the existing Ordinary or Deferred stocks of the Company. The allotment will be in the proportion of one in ten, and the "rights" entailed are assessed by the market at about five shillings per £100 stock. The new funds, I gather, are required to finance the building of new lines and the purchase of rolling stock. Leopoldinas

No. 1,571. WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1907.

"TRUTH" CAUTIONARY LIST.

IN accordance with the plan adopted last year, the Cautionary List of the various persons, firms, and organisations which have incurred unfavourable notice in TRUTH during 1906 appears again as a Special Supplement. In compiling this list it is not my intention to convey the idea that the persons and firms whose names are to be found therein are on any equality of turpitude. The compilation is based upon the broad principle that the necessity for caution exists in any dealings with the concerns mentioned. Where I consider an absolute swindle is being carried on by the parties named I state the fact in plain terms. On the other hand, where I consider inclusion to be warranted merely owing to undesirable methods by which business is carried on, and where the bona fides of the business itself are not in question, I indicate briefly the nature of the objection. My object is to supply my readers with a useful work of ready reference, so that they may be in a position to save both their time and my own by referring to it before applying to me for information contained therein. I have received so many testimonials to the value of the list in the past, that this year I have considerably extended its scope, so that the present compilation may well be considered still more valuable than hitherto both as a record of the past and a guide for the future. Amongst such additions I would specially call attention to the various concerns which have been dealt with from time to time in my City article. There is one other point which I think well to mention. It will be observed that a number of names of persons are given whose owners are at the present moment undergoing detention at one or another of H.M.'s penal establishments. Only those are included, however, who have been sentenced to short terms of imprisonment, and against whom a warning is likely to be useful in view of their early return to the world. Where, as in the case of the Rev. Vyvyan Moyle and "Monte-Carlo" Wells, both of whom figured in last year's list, a long term of imprisonment has put an end to their depredations, I have excluded their names from the list.

RELIGION AND PHILANTHROPY.

CHILDREN'S HELP FUND, 31, Paulet-road, Camberwell.—The latest alias of a woman named Eagles, who had previously been associated with another woman named Allen in carrying on "St. Mary's Protestant Home for Little Girls." Both were bogus charities, just sufficient pretence of work being made to protect the collectors from arrest by the police for obtaining money under false pretences.

FAITHFULL'S INSTITUTE, Miss, 54, Wellington-road, St. John's Wood (Miss Grey, Treasurer).—Had its origin in a work undertaken by Miss Emily Faithfull. Miss Faithfull has been dead for some years, but Miss Grey, who was formerly associated with the foundress, carries on the concern on her own account. She is partially dependent upon the contributions received from the public, and quite uncontrolled in her management of the funds.

GORDON MEMORIAL DAY NURSERY FOR LITTLE CHILDREN, AND SHAFTESBURY MEMORIAL SHOEBLACK OUTDOOR BRIGADE FOR HOMELESS, DESTITUTE, DEAF, DUMB, AND CRIPPLED BOYS.—Two bogus institutions for which money is collected by an individual styling himself the "Right Rev. Bishop" McLaglen. McLaglen, who is of South African origin, was originally a private in the army, and afterwards was connected for a while with the London City Mission. He later on became associated with a gang of bogus bishops, by whom he was "consecrated," and has no doubt found his episcopal "honours" useful in extracting charitable contributions from the public.

GOSPEL NEWS MISSION, Birkenhead.—The enterprise carried on by a coloured gentleman named the Rev. Hugh Jones, who makes some pretence of giving charitable relief, and undoubtedly lives by means of his charitable operations. Jones has been engaged for the past twelve years in similar undertakings in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, and needs to be suppressed.

GREEN, THOMAS BOWDEN, 1, Finsbury-circus, E.C.—A philanthropist who has been for many years on the "Cautionary Card" of the Charity Organisation Society. Promoter and for many years secretary of the National Thrift Society, a bogus philanthropic organisation which afforded Bowden Green a salary, and the means of obtaining premiums from unsuspecting people for appointments in subordinate capacities in his office. Afterwards founded the Betterment of London Association, of which he is "honorary secretary and editor." Has also promoted a company in which the bulk of the shares were allotted to him to do the printing of the Betterment of London Association, and has also transferred to it the "goodwill" of the Thrift Society.

HOWARD-STREET GOSPEL MISSION, Wandsworth (E. Moffatt Soames, "Honorary" General Secretary).—An obscure local charity which appeals widely for funds. After definite particulars had appeared in TRUTH regarding a cheque sent to the mission, which did not appear in the published accounts, Mr. Soames called at TRUTH Office to explain matters. He was invited to submit the books of the mission to the inspection of the Editor of TRUTH, an invitation he has not thought fit to accept.

LINNECAR, G. W., soi-disant "Reverend," Mansion House Mission, Camberwell.—An old-established charity-monger, dealing chiefly in "Urgent Appeals for 2s. 6d.," or some other sum, for the benefit of the poor in his district. His charitable work is insignificant, and the bulk of the money he collects goes to the upkeep of his chapel and himself as pastor.

LONDON INSTITUTION AND HOME FOR LOST AND STARVING CATS (Manageress and Foundress, Mrs. Z. Morgan).—Until exposed in TRUTH Mrs. Morgan was in uncontrolled management of the business and the cash. The business is mainly the destruction of stray and unwanted cats and the collection of funds. The cats kept in the "home" are those paid for by their owners or those otherwise useful as the stock-in-trade of the charity.

MACMILLAN, ROBERT, soi-disant "Reverend."—An individual with a disreputable history, who presides over a conventicle called Christ Church in Reedham-street, Peckham, and supports himself and family chiefly by cadging at offices and houses of business in London. His pretence at religion and charity is undiluted humbug.

MARCHANT, Miss KERSTEMAN, Doncaster.—This lady for twenty-four years past has been collecting funds in order to disperse "Aid to Irish Families of the Upper Class." She has never issued any accounts of her receipts and expenditure, and is entirely uncontrolled in her administration of the money.

MAY, REUBEN, Great Arthur-street Mission, E.C.—One of the oldest-established professional charity-mongers in London. Makes a great show of work in preaching and giving free meals, and distributes sensational appeals bearing little relation to the facts. Has for upwards of thirty years lived on this work, publishing no accounts, and giving no information as to what proportion of his receipts he pockets.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL ASSOCIATION FOR BEFRIENDING POOR CHILDREN, 19, Borough High-street, London, S.E.—An unsatisfactory charity for giving free meals and country holidays to children. Every £1 received costs 5s. to collect, and the administration of £334 of charity costs £800. The collectors chiefly "work" seaside resorts and race meetings.

MISSION TO CHILDREN, Harrow-street, Hessel-road, Hull.—A "mission" carried on by one Ernest H. Walters, into whose pockets a large proportion of the funds collected goes. He is practically uncontrolled in the collection and administration of the receipts, the secretary and committee having resigned in consequence of their dissatisfaction with Walters' conduct.

ORPHAN GIRLS' HOME, Somerleyton-road, Brixton.—The private enterprise of a pair of orphan-mongers named Street and Sillifant. Owing to an exposure of the condition of the "live stock" in the home in TRUTH, the home was closed by the action of the N.S.P.C.C. in August last. The man Street is a printer by trade, living in Kennington, and has been associated for years with the woman Sillifant in various pseudo-philanthropic enterprises, designed for the purpose of extracting subscriptions from the charitable.

PIONEER CHRISTIAN MISSION.—A "Mission" in Liverpool originally carried on by a notorious impostor named James Baxter and a man named George Smith, mainly by begging in the counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire. Baxter, while engaged in this missionary enterprise, was convicted and sentenced to two months' imprisonment. More recently it has been carried on by a man named John Matson, who has been fined under the Vagrancy Acts for soliciting alms.

POOR CHILDREN'S SOCIETY, THE.—A concern run by a man named George Breton. It has all the worst features of the most disreputable type of charitable agency. It draws an income of between £3,000 and £4,000 a year from the charitable public, has "homes" at Southend, and a hall in Southwark where free meals are dispensed, but the bulk of the money goes in "expenses." A pretence of reforming it has been gone through more than once, and gentlemen who have associated themselves with the committee for the purpose of reforming the management have retired from their task in disgust.

SAMARITAN BENEVOLENT FUND, Prince's-road, Kennington (A. King, Superintendent).—An enterprise of the wife of a vendor of cat's meat, who was formerly employed as a collector by the women Allen and Eagles. She rents a small cottage at Ramsgate, and gives away food and grocery tickets. She employs collectors, but keeps no books, and has no committee.

UNITED CHRISTIAN MISSION, THE.—A concern, making a pretence of dispensing charity in Liverpool, and run by one "Pastor" George Housley, who has been convicted by the Liverpool magistrates under the Vagrancy Acts.

WHITE ROCK HOME FOR ORPHAN AND DESTITUTE CHILDREN, Acre House, Everton Brow, Liverpool.—A one-woman charity carried on by a Mrs. Morris, who is in sole charge of the institution and its finances. Funds are collected all over the country, and out of every 5s. collected 2s. goes in salaries and expenses.

Amongst the clerical gentlemen whose actions have brought them under notice, apart from philanthropic or missionary enterprise, are the following:—

BROTHER ANTONY, Hagbourne, Didcot.—The son of a Berkshire farmer named Bullock who assumes a friar's habit and goes about the country begging energetically on behalf of "St. Francis d'Assisi League of Mercy." He is the league, and pouches the subscriptions. He was associated with the arch-swindler Donkin and other disreputable characters. For reasons best known to himself he disappeared from Hagbourne for some months last year, but has lately returned there and recommenced his begging operations.

BROWNE, "REV." W., President of the "Larger Hope Society."—An ex-convict, and an unmitigated rascal who was sentenced in 1895 to seven years' penal servitude for bigamy under peculiarly heartless circumstances. He is a hypocrite of the most obnoxious type.

HOWE, NEWTON EBENEZER, Tulse Hill.—Attempts to obtain loans for his personal use or for charitable schemes in which he is interested. Was formerly Vicar of Swindon, of which living he was deprived as the result of a series of disgraceful scandals.

ROGERS, REV. J.—A mysterious cleric who was formerly a tout for American Universities for the sale of their degrees, now offers to prepare candidates for holy orders. Originally agent for the sale of the bogus degrees of the notorious "Universitas Nationalis Illinoiensis."

WIDDOWS, "EX-MONK."—A notorious scoundrel who has served two terms of penal servitude in this country on disgusting charges, but still fools silly Protestants at the "Church of Martin Luther," South Hackney. In September last he was appealing for £400 to discharge a debt which was hanging over his head.

BEGGING LETTER WRITERS.

Many of the following names appeared in my last year's list, and it is quite obvious that the new members of this parasitic class indexed below have fully earned their right to have their names included:—

ATKINSON, W., Arkholme, Kirkby Lonsdale.—A beggar whose speciality is a pathetic request for cast-off clothes.

BEARDSALL, MATILDA, 23, Halifax-road, Enfield, Middlesex.—Tells various stories of troubles which produce temporary difficulties, and are calculated to unloose the purse-strings of the charitable.

BROOKS, GEORGE, Windsor House, Langland Bay, Glamorgan.—Originally a minister of some Nonconformist denomination, and a violent Radical. Changed his views and became a still more violent Tory. In this character produces political books and pamphlets in defence of the rights of property owners, brewers, Irish landlords, or vested interests generally; and disposes of them by addressing pathetic appeals to wealthy representatives of these classes, describing his personal and domestic distresses, and entreating them to support "his work," and himself, by buying copies of his publications. Having been described in TRUTH as "the prince of begging-letter writers," he some years ago brought a libel action against me, which collapsed ignominiously. He also brought actions against other papers, with the same result. Has continued, however, ever since to send out appeals of precisely the same character as those which formed the subject of the alleged libels upon him. In 1903 he became a "Tariff Reformer," and, stimulated by the General Election, became exceedingly active in the formation of "The Red Rose League," the object of which was to provide him with funds to circulate his pamphlets.

BURKE, ROBERT, Dublin.—For many years made a modest living by begging under the name of Hubert de Burgh on behalf of his sister, "the daughter of the late gifted Thomas McNevin." Now begging for funds to pay the expenses of publication of a history of "The O'Shaughnessys," and amongst others has bagged contributions from the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. A. J. Balfour.

FAUVEL, AUBREY A.—A retired paymaster R.N., who some years ago commuted his pension, lost the money, and has now quartered himself upon the service. A very persistent beggar.

FREYDANCK, J. F., 30, Walpole-street, Upton Park, E.—A German who, so far back as 1885, obtained help from the Friends of Foreigners in Distress to return to his native land, but when he did go it was merely to return with his wife and family. Asks for assistance to enable him to patent some wonderful invention or other.

HANHAM, MRS., wife of the Vicar of Graveney, Faversham.—After telling a long story of family trouble, begs for a loan of any amount up to £150. Has been engaged in the business for the past dozen years.

HARBOTTLE, MRS., Chacknell, Yarmouth, I.W.—A lady who, from a comfortable residence in the Isle of Wight, issues a widespread appeal for assistance to enable her to discharge a few liabilities. She is thoroughly unscrupulous in her methods of obtaining money, and quite undeserving of any sympathy.

HENVILLE, MRS., widow of the late Rector of Chipping Warden.—A thoroughly undeserving person. The late rector himself attained unenviable notoriety as a mendicant, and since his death his widow has been a systematic begging-letter writer.

HUCKS, A. E., 405, Albany-road, Camberwell.—A broken-down musician who has been begging for the past ten years for assistance to enable him to start work, to redeem his wife's wedding-ring, and to provide his poor wife and children with the necessities of existence.

KNIPE, F. S. C., 9, Teneriffe-street, Higher Broughton, Manchester.—Formerly a printer at Wolverhampton, who, after losing his sight through an accident, has developed into a systematic beggar. The Wolverhampton Society for the Blind, after having received a grant for his benefit, returned the money on the ground that he was "not a proper person to be further relieved."

LUDLOW, F., 46, Banner-road, Montpelier, Bristol.—"A poor stricken brother of the pen" who tells a woeful tale in order to induce other authors to subscribe to a book he proposes to publish. He is a drunken, worthless rascal whose last conviction was at Abingdon in March, 1906, when he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for obtaining money under false pretences. Immediately after his release he recommenced operations.

MANSFORD, JULIA, Clovelly, London-road, Norbury.—The widow of a gentleman formerly in a good position in New Zealand. Has begged systematically for loans to assist her in carrying on schools in the suburbs of London and Reigate, and her name has long appeared on the "Cautionary Card" of the Charity Organisation Society.

MCGREGOR, JOHN DUNCAN.—A Scottish journalist in London in an advanced state of consumption, who asks for assistance to enable him to go to South Africa. Has refused help from the Scots Corporation, which would have rendered a general appeal unnecessary and insists on his right to appeal to the "big-headed and big-hearted men of Scotland."

OLIVER, GEORGE M., Wellesley-road, Harrow.—An "old sportsman and dog lover" who appeals chiefly to Cornishmen. He is an old gentleman who has never been particularly fond of work, and who is provided for by his children.

Harry Ransom Humanities Research Library. The University of Texas at Austin

ROSENTRAUCH, A., alias Abraham Hornstein, 67, Great Russell-street, W.C.—A "converted" Austrian Jew, who, since his conversion has gained a livelihood by posing as a Christian Missionary to the Jews. Has begged vigorously for his mission, and latterly for support while suffering from an injured ankle, and for funds to meet a publisher's account. He is a thorough-going humbug.

SAUNDERS, FRANK HEATH, 5, Willowfield-road, Eastbourne.—One of the most persistent of beggars now before the public. His particular "lay" is to get up a dramatic and musical recital, and he forwards a parcel of tickets with a request for patronage backed up by a story of a sick wife and starving family.

WILLIAMS, JAMES R., alias J. R. Jones.—A professional beggar who writes from accommodation addresses in London to residents in Lancashire, claiming assistance on the grounds of acquaintance with their families early in his life. States that he was in business in America but has been ruined by some accident beyond his control.

WILSON, ROBERT HOGARTH PATTENSON, 15, Lavender-road, Clapham Junction.—Has been engaged in begging-letter writing and swindling for the past twenty years, in the course of which he has served one term of six months' hard labour, and another of three years' penal servitude, the latter for forgery.

WILSON-BONCHARD, J. T., 2, Hampton-parade, Ilford, Essex.—Sends out a little pamphlet entitled "Poems Composed in Prison," and follows it up with a printed circular requesting the remittance of a P.O. for 1s.

In addition to the before-mentioned more or less professional begging-letter writers, a number of clerical gentlemen who issue begging appeals to the public either on behalf of themselves or their churches have come under notice in TRUTH during the past year. Where the appeal is for church funds for local purposes it is desirable that contributors should be in a position to see for themselves how the funds are administered; where assistance is asked on the grounds of personal need it should be remembered that properly administered charities such as the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation, already in existence, may be relied upon to deal promptly with cases of real necessity.

BROWNE, REV. S. S., North Cove, Beccles.—An elderly clergyman, who for years past has issued appeals for funds for the restoration of his church, containing all sorts of loose and inconsistent statements.

HOWELL, REV. E. P., Rector of Penraeth, Anglesea.—Relates a melancholy story of financial embarrassment under the handicap of severe illness in his family.

JONES, REV. J. W. Vicar of Mydrim, Carmarthen.—Tells a distressing story of domestic trouble and straitened circumstances. Has begged for the past five or six years, besides having received relief from the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation, though his income is at least £200 per annum.

TWEEDALE, REV. CHARLES L., Vicar of Weston, near Otley.—Solicits orders for all sorts of goods, from violins to motor-cars, in order to supplement his small income and save his family from starvation.

HOME EMPLOYMENT TRICKSTERS.

Under this heading are grouped firms whose objects are to sell various articles to persons by deluding them into the belief that by purchasing such articles they are obtaining the necessary materials for undertaking some form of remunerative home employment.

ALBION SHOW CARD COMPANY, 203, Strand.

BRITISH MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 187, Quinn's-square, Waterloo-road.—A concern, located in a block of workmen's dwellings, which seeks to sell a cheap fountain pen for 2s. 6d., as "materials" for copying testimonials to the value of the said pen.

FORD, BRUCE LESTER, alias PLOWDEN AND CO.—Offered to supply envelope addressing work upon receipt of a deposit of 3s. Convicted at the Newington Sessions in March last and sentenced to six months' hard labour.

HAMILTON STENCIL COMPANY, 43, Dunkeld-street, Poplar.—Offers employment at stencil-cutting on receipt of 1s. 5d., to cover "cost of advertising, postage, etc."

HOLMES, THOMAS JAMES.—A harpy of the same type as Ford, who was sentenced to sixty days' imprisonment at Glasgow in August. Said to be an ex-evangelist.

IMPERIAL ART SUPPLY COMPANY, of Chichester House, Chancery Lane, and 17, Ranelagh Avenue, Fulham.—Charge 7s. 6d. for the "outfit" supplied to their dupes.

NATIONAL HOME EMPLOYMENT ASSOCIATION.—Albermarle Works, Hounslow.—Are proprietors of a scheme by which the unemployed can earn from 30s. to £5 a week by the sale of transferable pictures or by converting them into magic lantern slides. The outfit for the purpose costs from 5s. to 10s. 6d.

PAYNTER AND CO., Mysore-road, Clapham Junction; SMITH AND CO., Southall; NORTH AND CO., Teddington; THOMAS AND CO., Twickenham.—All aliases of a Thomas Paynter, who was committed for trial at the Old Bailey in September, 1905, but being let out on bail he absconded, and has not since been heard of. Since that date the business has been carried by a brother of the absconding Paynter.

TRUSCOTT AND CO., Torquay. An old-established swindler, who is one of Paynter and Co.'s principal rivals.

WILSON, MRS., 27, Kempston-road, Bedford.—Advertises her ability to put ladies in the way of earning 10s. a week and upwards, and supplies them with begging letters to copy. Does not always pay for the copying work done to order.

REGISTRATION OFFICES AND EMIGRATION AGENCIES.

The coming into force of the new Act of Parliament giving the London County Council powers of inspection and control over agencies in the metropolis providing for female employees has had a most beneficial effect, the consequence being that only one of the class came under notice during the past year. From the list which appears below it is evident that the extension of the Act to the whole country and the widening of its provisions to include all agencies which charge preliminary fees would prevent a vast amount of fraud.

ASPDIN, JAMES, Tewkesbury, alias C. E. Farrant, Dymoch, Gloucestershire.—A well-known exporter of farm pupils to Canada of the type against which the Canadian Government expressly warns intending emigrants.

BRUCE, MRS., Brighton.—Had a gifted nurse who would come up to London to be interviewed if expenses were defrayed, but made use of an accommodation address.

COLYER AND COLYER, 3, Featherstone-buildings, High Holborn.—Colyer is a young American who defrauded sea-side hotel-keepers on pretence of booking rooms for visitors. He was sentenced at Scarborough to six months' hard labour in August last.

EMPIRE MERCANTILE AGENCY, 158, Fenchurch-street, E.C.—A fee-grabbing agency, which advertises indiscriminately for employees to whom it can offer no suitable work, and sends them to employers to whom it has introduced itself by answering advertisements in a fictitious character.

SCHOLASTIC REGISTRATION ASSOCIATION.—Secretary, E. Newton Lane, 179, Replingham-road, Merton-road, Wimbledon.—Asks for a fee of a guinea as a preliminary step to the introductions of pupils from India. He uses an accommodation address, and his methods are reminiscent of a man named Ridley Carr, alias Paget, who has several times been convicted of similar frauds.

"STANDARD" EMPLOYMENT BUREAU, 145, Cannon-street, E.C.—Offer to obtain situations for a fee of £15, half to be paid within two days of acceptance of the berth. Has no connection with The Standard newspaper.

"THE LADY'S GRAPHIC," 13, Featherstone-buildings, London, W.C.—A concern which sought preliminary fees on the pretence that they were paid in return for advertisements, with a view to evade the County Council regulations and inspection.

VERNON, E., 116, Anlaby-road, Hull.—A fee-snatching agency of the ordinary type.

MEDICAL QUACKS.

The number of these is a remarkable tribute to the gullibility of the British public, and an almost equally remarkable exhibition of callousness and carelessness on the part of the proprietors of newspapers and magazines who assist them in their predatory efforts. There is a certain amount of consolation, however, to be derived from the fact that two of the rankest amongst them—Hawkins and Richards—have been brought to justice in the course of the year.

AURAL CLINIC, late the DROUET INSTITUTE FOR THE DEAF, 102-104, New Oxford-street, W. — The London branch of a swindle started in Paris by an English adventurer now dead, who was connected with one Nicholson, a notorious sharper, who, after serving a term of imprisonment in England for various frauds, was extradited to Germany and there convicted. The swindle consists of supplying various well-known remedies under the pretence that the "Institute" is the depository of various epoch-making discoveries made by one Drouet—an obscure general practitioner in Paris, who died in a hospital after giving the use of his name to the founder of the "Institute." It seems to be somewhat on the down grade, possibly owing to a pronouncement by Lord Justice Matthew that it was "a disgraceful institution, carried on for unworthy objects by discreditable means."

BELL, MR. JOHN, 11, Clarence-gardens, N.W.—Is ready to cure catarrh by "The German Method" for 8s. 4d.

BILE BEANS MANUFACTURING CO., Leeds.—The business of this company was declared by Lord Ardwall, in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, on July 5, 1905, to be "founded entirely upon fraud, impudence, and advertisement." The business is the sale of Bile Beans.

BRITISH ELECTRIC INSTITUTE, 23, Holborn Viaduct.—Proprietor of one of the electric belt flat traps, called the "Ajax Dry Cell."

CLIFTON, H., 35, Waterloo-road, S.E.—Another deaf-quack, who prescribes ear drums and charges 16s. 6d. for them.

CO-RO-NA VAPOUR MEDICATOR COMPANY, 37A, Southampton-row.—Advertises a catarrh cure, including a vaporiser at £2 2s. (the ordinary price of which is 5s. 6d.), and 4s. 6d. for drugs (which are worth 6d.).

HAWKINS, REV., and REV. T. STONE, of Chesham-road, Kemp Town Brighton; FENN'S AGENCY, 5, Whymark-avenue, London, N.; REV. JOSEPH HOPE, St. Cloud, Worthing; HAWKINS AND Co., Advertising Contractors, Kemp Town, Brighton. All aliases of one disreputable quack, named William Henry Hawkins, who not only preyed on the credulity of sufferers, but not infrequently swindled the newspapers which inserted his advertisements. He was convicted at Lewes Assizes last November, and sentenced to three months' hard labour, and from the facts elicited at his trial it was shown that he must have been plundering the public to the extent of £2,000 to £3,000 a year.

IRON OX.—A widely advertised cure-all, which has purchased and made use of provably fraudulent testimonials.

KEITH-HARVEY, "PROFESSOR." — Another deaf-quack, who advertises to an enormous extent in the British press, his speciality being a so-called "aural battery," which he supplements, however, by the usual list of highly-priced medicaments.

MONTAGUE, CHARLES, Corporation-chambers and other addresses in Birmingham.—"Rheumatic specialist." Advertises from all parts of the country, and in a variety of names, as a lady desirous of imparting the knowledge of a remedy stated to have cured her of "Rheumatoid Arthritis." To those who reply he sends, without further communication, a parcel of his medicine and the bill, payment of which he then endeavours to extort by threats. For this purpose he poses as a debt-collecting company, to which he pretends to sell his own debts. Formerly passed as "Charles Ashley" and "Napoleon Hirschfield." Bankrupt some years ago, when he absconded and committed other offences under the Debtors Act, on account of which his discharge was refused in 1898.

NICHOLAS, OTTO, 96, Tottenham Court-road, W.—A "specialist" who annoys small advertisers in the daily papers by sending them filthy circulars.

PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, Burgess Hill. Richard Haynel, director.—Advertises a home treatment for asthma, consumption, and a variety of other diseases, making the same pretence as the Drouet Institute of diagnosing the cases of applicants by correspondence. At an inquest held in July last it was shown that the Institute had treated at the usual fees a case which medical evidence declared was hopeless.

POINTING.—The following ten names are aliases of one A. L. Pointing, trading at Century House, Regent-street, W., and in 9 and 10, Pugh's-place, close by. Deals in ordinary quack remedies, mostly lifted with the advertisements and literature distributed in connection with them, from American quacks. "Antidipso" has been shown by the Lancet to be a downright swindle, and several of the other remedies are no better. The Grecian School of Physical Culture is a reproduction of a Yankee notion for teaching physical exercises by correspondence.

MURRAY Co.—Artificial ear-drums.
WARD CHEMICAL Co.—"Antidipso" drink-cure.
CAPILLUS MANUFACTURING Co.—Superfluous-hair destroyer.
HELEN TEMPLE.—Superfluous-hair destroyer.
THE MR. T. TEMPLE ASSOCIATION.—The Temple Nerve and Flesh Food.
MR. F. H. TEMPLE.—Cure for blushing.
ESPANOLA MEDICINE Co.—Female bust improver.
FELL FORMULA ASSOCIATION.—"Anti-fat" tablets.
MAGIC FOOT DRAFT Co.—Cure for rheumatism.
GRECIAN SCHOOL OF PHYSICAL CULTURE.

RICHARD, "PROFESSOR."—An itinerant quack of Spanish-American origin, who poses as a "medical electrician." Is well known in all parts of the British Empire, in most of which he has got into trouble of one kind or another. He obtains his victims by means of public lectures, and is a dangerous scoundrel of a most disreputable type. Was brought to justice at Staffordshire Assizes in July last, and sentenced to twelve months' hard labour.

"SACCO" COMPANY, 22, Basinghall-street, E.C.—The proprietors of a remedy for consumption, which was first put on the market by a man named Stevens, who claimed to have discovered the recipe used in its production amongst the Kaffirs and Zulus. The company circulates in a mutilated form an article which appeared in TRUTH, in which an opinion was expressed that "Sacco" appeared to be "a good cough mixture," and omitting a condemnation of its sale as an absolute remedy for consumption.

SANCHE AND Co., DR. H.—Propose to cure all diseases by the use of the Oxydonor. The dupe, after paying £5 for the Oxydonor, attaches it to one limb and places the other end in a bucket of water, and the disease is thereby presumed to be transferred to the water.

ULLA SOCIETY, Bridlington, Yorks.—The society was originally formed to boom a new universal language, but, failing in this, now seeks to cure the deaf with auraloids and the nervous with nervaloids.

VAN NIEKERK, MRS.—A South African quack, who owns the Aesiab Cancer Cure. This is an ointment, the use of which in certain cases appears, not only to have hastened death, but to have made it horrible. The price of the cure is £1 1s. 6d., and the ordinary trade price of a similar pot of stuff is 6d. or 1s.

WILLIAMS "PROFESSOR," Blenheim House, Oxford Street W.—Professes to initiate dupes in "the mysteries of hypnotism" by means of a course of twenty lessons, price 18s. 6d.

The rest of the names in this list are all of Transatlantic origin, and it is worthy of note that a number of the concerns, while debarred from the use of the mails in their own country, are allowed to practise in this country with perfect immunity from interference:—

AMERICAN COLLEGE OF SCIENCES, Rochester, New York.—Sells a worthless course of instruction in personal magnetism and hypnotism. Together with the Yabe School and K. Leo Minges, mentioned below, is the enterprise of one F. D. Shoemaker, jeweller, of 59, Page-street, Providence, R.I.

DERK P. YONKERMAN COMPANY, Bouverie-street, London, E.C.—The advertisers of a cure for consumption called Tuberculozyne, which claims to produce its effect by newly-discovered salts of copper. Analysis proves the claim to be fictitious, and the methods adopted by the "company" in their advertisements are sufficient to prove these Yankee adventurers quacks of the rankest description.

KIDD, "DR." JAMES WILLIAM, Fort Wayne, Ind., U.S.A., and of 423, Saracen's-buildings, Snow-hill, London.—Advertises profusely all over the world, offering to cure all diseases, and to send a sample of his treatment "free." The remedies appear to be absolute humbug, and are supplied in quantities at extravagant prices, as much as £4 having been obtained from victims in some cases.

K. LEO MINGES, Rochester, New York, and 7, Avenue de l'Opéra, Paris. — Proprietor of a "cartilege treatment," which is guaranteed to add two or three inches to the height. It is undiluted humbug.

LIQUOZONE.—A nostrum very widely advertised by a firm of American quacks, calling themselves the British Liquozone Company, as a cure for all germ diseases. It is nothing more than a weak solution of sulphurous acid, a drug which is likely to prove dangerous if administered by inexperienced hands. At an inquest in June, 1905, on two children who died after taking the stuff, the jury returned a verdict that they "died from exhaustion after vomiting and diarrhœa, set up by taking liquozone."

M. A. WINTER COMPANY, Pennsylvania-avenue, Washington.—Offers agencies to people of position to peddle their Nature's Sweet Restorer, a cure-all made up into "highly polished chocolate drops."

MCLAUGHLIN Co., THE "DR.," 164, Strand. — Vendors of "electric belts," the sale of which has been pushed by means of grossly indecent circulars and literature, and by the most lavish advertisements, not only in England, but all over the world. One of its London representatives (an ex-medical practitioner, who had been struck off the register after a conviction for felony) was prosecuted for illegally holding himself out as a qualified medical practitioner. Latterly the company has been offering its £5 goods for £1. A few months ago the German police issued an official notice warning the public that the appliance is a fraudulent swindle.

NUTRIOLA COMPANY, CHICAGO, and 9-15, Oxford-street, London. —The enterprise of a Yankee named Hanson, the "President" of the company. Not content with advertising its ability to cure everything, the company has also advertised purchase of its shares as the shortest way to wealth. Nevertheless, a fraud order has been made against the company by the United States postal authorities, and it is worthy of remark that the president of the company has already been bankrupt in America.

OREN ONEAL, "DR.," 162, State-street, Chicago.—An eye and ear quack, who has an eye on the suffering British public.

OXIEN.—A remedy for heart troubles, sold by the Giant Oxie Company by means of faked testimonials.

PIERCE ELECTRIC COMPANY, 11 and 12, Finsbury-square, E.C.—Proprietors of Dr. Pierce's Galvanic Chain Belt, and a magnetic truss. The company hails from San Francisco, and after pretending to diagnose a case by correspondence, offers one of the above appliances as a remedy.

RICE, W. S., Stonecutter-street, E.C.—Another American "specialist," dealing in rupture-cures.

SANDEN ELECTRIC COMPANY, THE "DR."—A similar concern to the McLaughlin Co., now trading in South Africa, India, Brazil, and the Argentine, the representative of which has also been fined for representing himself as a qualified medical practitioner.

VIAVI COMPANY, BRITISH, Regent-street, W.—A quack establishment of American origin, dealing in remedies for female ailments. Engages women, who go about the country pretending to possess medical knowledge, delivering "health lectures," which they have mostly learnt by heart, and persuading deluded women that they are in serious danger unless they take the Viavi remedies, and submit themselves to the treatment of the Viavi agents.

WESTCOTT-JENNER, PROFESSOR, Commerce-chambers, Duke-street, Liverpool.—Proprietor of the "Alcola Treatment," with which he professes to cure drunkards.

YABE SCHOOL OF JIU-JITSU, Rochester, N.Y.—Professes to be able to teach the Japanese art of self-defence by correspondence.

The five concerns in the following list have been officially declared to be carrying on a fraudulent business in the United States, and a "fraud order" has been made against them.

DR. KNAPP MEDICAL COMPANY, Detroit, Michigan.
FALLIOPIA LYNN COMPANY, St. Louis.
INSTITUTE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS, Rochester, New York.
"PROFESSOR" R. E. DUTTON, Lincoln, Nebraska.
"PROFESSOR" THOMAS F. ADKIN, Rochester, New York.

TRADING CONCERNS.

A great many businesses incur criticism in TRUTH for one cause or another in the course of a year, and the reasons for criticism vary greatly in gravity. The following includes such businesses as I have expressly warned my readers, on one ground or another, to have nothing at all to do with:—

BARKER AND Co., J., Richmond.—One of the ordinary "area-gate" touts who victimise servant girls.

BRIGHTON AND SOUTH COAST MERCANTILE AND LEGAL AID SOCIETY, 8, Gloucester-place, Brighton.—The enterprise of a man named Smith, whose object is to obtain subscriptions from tradesmen, who are offered in return free advice on financial and commercial subjects. Smith was sentenced in January, 1905, to twelve months' imprisonment for defrauding a Brighton tradesman, and in November last was convicted for another eighteen months.

CAMPBELL, SMITH, AND Co., 5, Garrick-street, St. Martin's-lane.—Holders of sham auction sales of secondhand furniture in private houses.

CITY CASH COMPANY, 59½, Causeway-lane, Leicester.—Trick advertisers of a skirt.

CITY OF LONDON FINE ART SOCIETY, Victoria-avenue, E.C.—Lineal descendant of the South Kensington Fine Art Society, whose stock of "works of art" the "Society" offers at 25 per cent. reduction off the catalogue prices.

CLIFFORD AND Co., 4, York-buildings, Clifton, Bristol.—Sell cigars and tobacco on the snowball system.

COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL, Rochester, N.Y.—The old trick for getting dollars from the unwary by one of the gang who used to be engaged in selling a "course of lessons" in personal magnetism, hypnotism, magnetic healing, and the allied occult mysteries.

CO-OPERATIVE SICKNESS AND ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION, LIMITED, 3, Broad-street-buildings, E.C.—A large scheme of industrial assurance to be carried on by means of checks sold with goods by tradespeople with a working capital of only £2,300. It is the offspring of Messrs. Dickins and Hibbin, who were formerly associated in the area-gate tout business.

COWAN, A. W., 30, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars, London.—A shady publisher, who gets orders for serial publications by trickery and enforces payment by threats of recourse to law.

CRAIG, CRAIG, AND Co., 125, West Regent-street, Glasgow.—A firm which charges a higher price for all goods paid for in advance than if paid for at the time of delivery.

DAVIES MAIL ORDER COLLECTION AGENCY, Madison Hall-buildings, Chicago.—A Yankee debt-collecting agency, which is the proud possessor of "The eye that never sleeps," and attempts to bluff debtors by a farrago of nonsense about taking criminal proceedings against them.

DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE Co., Norwich.—Have introduced into the cycle trade the popular advertising trick of offering goods ostensibly on credit, whereas the goods are delivered only on payment of the last instalment.

DIRECT TRADING COMPANY, 1A, Caledonian-road, King's Cross.—Trick advertisers of bicycles.

DOREY, LESTER, AND Co., Winchester-avenue, Kilburn.—Offers watches and jewellery by postal circular, and omits to send the goods after the cash has been paid. Does this business chiefly with India and the Colonies.

ELECTRIC PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Electric Avenue, Brixton.—Issue misleading advertisements of the goods they sell.

FELLOWS AND Co., 10, Grosvenor-buildings, Steelhouse-lane, Birmingham.—Adopt Ernest Goode's old trick of "presenting" a watch to purchasers of a chain, catching their dupes by prize competitions.

FORBES, FORBES, AND Co., 164, Howard-street, Glasgow.—The name adopted by the benevolent proprietors of a "Blue-ribbon" blend of whisky in an attempt to exploit charity for commercial purposes.

FOSTER AND Co., P., 36-37, Charterhouse-square.—By a trick offer of a skirt the firm secures 1s. 9d. for a rubbishy belt, worth only a fraction of the price.

FRASER AND Co., 51, Milton-street, E.C.—Offered a prize of £5 to everyone who correctly solved the 15 puzzle, the condition of entry being payment of 2s. 6d. for three dozen postcards.

"GENTLEFOLKS" and the "WORLD'S COMMERCE," 40, Rectory-road, London, N.—Periodicals devoted to descriptive articles, which are practically trade advertisements. The editor invites firms to supply particulars for an article, adding that he does not expect an advertisement. Subsequently proposes that the articles shall be illustrated, free of all charge except payment for the blocks. The charge for the blocks, in fact, represents a handsome payment for the whole article. The moving spirit is one Jesse Fletcher, who ran the "Great North Magazine," until a claim he brought against a Midland firm was successfully resisted on the ground of "fraudulent misrepresentation."

"GENTLEMAN'S JOURNAL," 104, Tollington Park, N. (W. Browning Hearnden, Editor).—Another enterprise carried on by precisely similar methods to the foregoing.

GEROME AND Co., C., 83-87, Fleet-street, E.C.—Offer a variety of prizes to persons who sell six shillingsworth of "Happy Home Seeds."

GLEN DISTILLERY, LTD., Campsie Glen.—A whisky business run by one Alfred Reiss, alias Ross, and advertised by an elaborate series of mendacious statements.

GOLD AND Co., alias the SILVER PLATE COMPANY, Delamere-crescent, Paddington.—Engaged in the "send no money" line of business, by which people are induced to take goods for sale or return, in the hope of earning a "premium"; also in other forms of trick advertising.

GRAVES, LTD, J. G., Sheffield.—A firm of general dealers, which carries on an enormous business by advertisement and through local agents. People are induced to purchase all sorts of goods on the instalment system, and payment is enforced by a variety of undesirable methods. The extent to which members of the public are led to purchase articles which they either do not want or cannot afford may be gauged from the fact that 7,000 summonses in the County Court were issued in one year against the firm's customers.

HARDY AND Co., I. A., The United Kingdom, Colonial, and Foreign General Accountancy Offices, 70, 71, 72, Chancery-lane.—The ostensible business of the firm is debt-collecting, but experience shows that the business is more profitable to Mr. Hardy than to the creditors who employ him.

IMPERIAL PUBLISHING COMPANY, Oxford House, Oxford Street, W.—Advertise an ordinary manual under the title "The Piano in Twelve Lessons," and describe their system as one which will revolutionise teaching.

JACKSON AND Co., Business Transfer Agents, 3, Bayley-street, Tottenham Court-road.—The alias of a rascal named Abraham Nathan Jacobson. This man undertakes the sale and purchase of businesses, and whatever money goes into his hand sticks there. He is well known at Bloomsbury County Court, and he is an undischarged bankrupt, so that his unfortunate victims usually allow him to go scot-free.

JACKSON AND Co., 2, Harvey-buildings, Strand.—Trick advertisers of boots.

KENT WATCH COMPANY, 142, Church-road, Swanscombe, Kent.—Plays the good old trick of offering a magnificent watch "free of all charge"—to purchasers of a chain.

KINGSWAY PHONOGRAPH COMPANY, Ferndale Road, Clapham.—Issue misleading advertisements of their goods.

KING AND SON, JOHN K., 12, Albert-street, Manchester.—A firm of booksellers who get rid of their goods by canvassers, and who have been known to claim damages for breach of contract when the order is repudiated.

LEICESTER AND Co., Twickenham.—The alias of a man named Todd, one of the most active of the "area-gate" firms, selling on credit expensive watches, jewellery, Bibles, and other articles to servant girls through touting agents, who resort to various tricks for trapping girls into giving them orders. Todd has been fined £20 for representing himself to be a solicitor in order to intimidate his victims.

LESTER AND Co., 76, Chancery-lane.—A firm which induces children to undertake the sale of picture postcards by the offer of a present, and endeavours to extort payment by means of threatening letters and postcards.

LOCAL TIME TABLE COMPANY, LTD., Croydon.—Publishes suburban time tables and obtains large numbers of advertisements in each district. The orders for advertisements are "faked," and when disputes arise the advertisers are summoned in the Croydon County Court. The amount at issue being small, they usually allow judgment to go by default, so that the business is a profitable one.

MACDONALD AND Co., W., Edinburgh.—Produce worthless and voluminous directories, by means of the sweated labour of unfortunate agents.

MAISON ROSSET, Rue Feydeau, Paris.—Sells silk underskirts on the snowball system.

MCCABE AND WEBBER, LTD., Bank-buildings, Margaret-street, and 11, Great Titchfield-street, London, W. — Offer watches "free," on the snowball coupon plan to the natives of British East Africa.

MERCANTILE AGENCY, 303, High Holborn.—The name under which a Mr. Macdonald carries on a debt-collecting business and retains the debts he collects.

MIDLAND COUNTIES ADVERTISING Co., Sheffield.—Lets space in advertising boxes, and when tradesmen have been tricked into signing contracts enforces these latter through the County Court, in the same way as the above-mentioned Time Table Company.

NATIONAL PEAT FUEL COMPANY, 76, Leadenhall-street; IRISH PEAT FUEL AND MOSS LITTER COMPANY, 40, Gracechurch-street; PEAT FUEL COMPANY, 50, Wilson-street, E.C.—Bilk unfortunate distributors of their circulars of their wages, and do not pay the wholesalers for their peat.

PAUL AND Co., Aston Manor.—A mail-order specialist, who supplies socks and stockings at tempting prices, and guarantees to keep them in repair for three months. When returned to him for repair he is found to have disappeared.

"RAILWAY SUPPLIES JOURNAL."—Another enterprise of the same class as "Gentlefolks," run by a Mr. E. P. Phillips, who has been convicted and imprisoned for frauds in connection with his publication.

Scottish Photographic, Touring, and Pictorial Postcard Company, 74, Broomielaw, Glasgow.—Another firm of the same type as the Salbini Company mentioned above.

Scottish Wholesale Jewellery Emporium, 205, Buchanan-street, Glasgow.—Supply shoddy jewellery on credit and extort payment by threatening letters.

Selkirk and Co., J., Ltd., Mail Order and Business Specialists, Bouverie-street, London, E.C. — A firm of astute advertising agents, who claim to be business builders. They provide "schemes" for improving their clients' business, but have recently found their way into the Bankruptcy Court, owing, by their own account, to the criticisms of their methods which have appeared in Truth.

Stamp Prize Bureau, 17, Coventry-street, Kidderminster.—Sends circulars to schoolmasters for distribution amongst their scholars, offering cash prizes for collections of stamps, which go to swell the stock-in-trade of the firm.

Stores Advertising System, Ltd.; The Registered Co-operative Societies' Sickness and Accident Assurance, Ltd.; The Retailers' Sickness and Accident Association, Ltd. A group of companies associated in some way with the Co-operative Sickness and Accident mentioned before, and whose shares a Mr. J. W. Rackham has been attempting to palm off on medical gentlemen and others by offering them appointments.

Stuart and Simpson, St. George's House, Eastcheap.—Engage bands of lady canvassers to push novelties in the provinces, the canvassers frequently finding themselves stranded, and without redress in consequence of the agreement they are required to sign.

Thomas, A., otherwise The City of London Direct Supply Stores, 317, Upper-street, Islington. — Advertises all sorts of goods, either for cash or on credit, but purchasers frequently have difficulty in getting their purchases. The proprietor is a Mr. A. T. Yandell, who some months ago arranged for the business to be carried on under a committee of inspection until his creditors had been paid 10s. in the £.

Warrilow and Co., Weston-super-Mare.—A firm of bicycle manufacturers who offer their goods as marvellous bargains from private addresses.

Williams and Co., 84, Erskine-road, Walthamstow.—Trick advertisers of bicycles.

Wilson, H., 40, St. Luke's-road, Clapham.—A trick advertiser of a dentifrice.

Miscellaneous Practitioners.

The following individuals and institutions are working each in a distinctive line so that it is impossible to group them under any of the previous headings:—

Agricultural and Industrial Society, Ltd.; The Agricultural Organisation Agency, Ltd.; The British and Irish Cattle Corporation, Ltd.—All three are the schemes of a gentleman named Tallerman, who is something of a crank, but as he seeks other people's money to develop his schemes, it is desirable to avoid him.

Alexander, F. Matthias, 1, Army and Navy Mansions, Victoria-street, S.W.—Proprietor of a "New Method of Respiratory and Vocal Re-education," whose methods of dunning dissatisfied clients for the balance of fees are both novel and undesirable.

Appleton, A. Stewart.—An enterprising Yankee deadhead, who applies to theatrical managers for free seats, in order to be in a position to write critical articles in a European edition of his polyglot magazine.

Barnes, Albert E., late of the Wynards, Merriott, Crewkerne, Somerset.—Swindles tradesmen living at a distance, sending his orders on notepaper headed "Get Right with God." Under cover of philanthropy and religion has perpetrated a variety of swindles at Bristol and Plymouth, and has been several times in prison. Now writing begging letters from addresses in London.

Benevolent Dental Society of Great Britain, 7 Whitefriars-street.—An advertising dodge for the sale of artificial teeth. The "Society" professed to supply free teeth to the toothless poor. Applicants for the teeth were directed to apply to Messrs. Guy White and Co., Ltd., of 215, Piccadilly, who would supply their wants at reduced terms on the instalment plan. The enterprise was conducted by Mr. Edwin Drew, a gentleman of divers gifts, and the outcome was the appearance of the members of the firm of Guy White and Co. before the Medical Council, where two of them were struck off the register for "infamous conduct."

Bradley, Ltd., H., 29, Great James-street, Bedford-row.—The enterprise of a Mr. Gannell, which consists in finding secretaries and directors who can invest substantial sums in various companies.

Brezet, Adolphe, Baron Ghelavelt, Viscompte San Joao, Duke of Beaufort, Duke of Valentinois, Prince of Antikich.—An adventurer of French extraction, who claims to be President of the "Free Republic of Counani," a territory under Brazilian Government. In this capacity has appointed a number of official representatives in this country, chief of whom is a Charge d'Affaires, an accountant named Campbell-Everden. The object of the assumption of the Presidency appears to be the granting of concessions and titles to British dupes.

British Arbitration Committee, 20, Upper Richmond-road, S.W.—Undertakes to settle disputes between buyers and sellers of farm produce for a fee of 12s. 6d. Has at present no fixed habitation.

Clarke, Charles M., LL.D., 28, Baker-street, W.C.—Cadges samples of goods from manufacturers under pretence of writing an article about them in his journal, "Dramatic Opinion." Was formerly connected with a bogus literary society, which, after exposure in Truth, landed all concerned in serious trouble.

Club International de Bienfaisance, Amsterdam. — A gambling club touting for members in this country at an annual subscription of 20 fr.

Count and Countess di Colonna y de Vere, 131, Manor-road, Brockley.—The count is in the guinea-pig business, while the countess touts for tradesmen on commission, the coronet and title being a useful asset in introducing themselves to strangers.

Cotiell, Lansdowne, the "London Conservatoire of Music," 29, Craven-terrace, Lancaster-gate, W.—A teacher of music who keeps a boarding-house for young men and women desirous of studying music, and fills it by various misrepresentations, his favourite trick being to persuade the pupil that he or she has won a "scholarship" entitling him or her to tuition "free," on paying merely for board and lodging. The advantages offered by the "conservatoire," whether in the shape of board and lodging or tuition, are altogether delusive. Has also recently started the Prince's Concert Direction Company, the object of which seems to be the extraction of guinea fees from aspirants to musical honours.

Davey, R. H., 107, Holland Park-avenue, and W. Davey, 641, High-road, Tottenham.—The names under which attempts have been made to obtain whisky on credit from Scottish firms.

Day, Ernest, 439, Old Kent-road.—Dealer in old prints and portraits, which he picks up for a few pence and sells for one or two guineas to parties having the same name as the originals of the portraits, on the representation that the article offered is a valuable old picture which has lately come into his possession through the death of a relative, and which he is compelled to sacrifice at a nominal price to relieve his straitened circumstances. "Ernest" is probably a lady.

Dryerre, Rev. J. Meldrum, Burnham, Somerset. — At one time a Congregational minister, who touts for orders for advertisements in a book he is about to publish by offering "laudatory comments" in the text. Well known for begging operations in connection with previous publications.

Earl of Peterborough.—A claimant to an extinct earldom, who with his mother and sister obtains credit on the strength of stories about his impending recognition.

Easby Society, 17, Albion-street, Leeds (John R. Wildman, secretary and treasurer).—Asks newspaper proprietors to pay a guinea a year for publishing an advertisement open to the objection that it is likely to delude people in assurance against sickness, accidents, and death.

Eichler, A., 103, St. John's-street, Clerkenwell. — Issues a series of trashy novels in weekly instalments at 2d. or 2½d. through canvassers, with offers of a premium in the shape of a rocking-chair, musical album, or similar goods. First came under notice in connection with some copyright proceedings, in which Mr. Justice Buckley pronounced one of the publications to be obscene.

Frayer and Walker, Messrs., 151, Seedley Park-road, Manchester.—A firm which undertakes to supply to manufacturers information of all opportunities for doing business in their particular lines in any part of the kingdom for a subscription of £4 4s., but does so in a very unsatisfactory manner.

Free Teeth Society and People's Teeth Association, 177, Westminster Bridge-road.—Another firm in the same line of business as the Benevolent Dental Society already mentioned.

Garner "Professor."—A "Professor" of the Simian language, who has bamboozled numbers of people with stories of his adventures in African forests. It has been recently rumoured that the Professor is about to start on a new expedition to the Dark Continent.

Gaskell, Ernest (author), late Manning Press, Graylands, Langley, Bucks.—Now engaged in looking for "Lancashire Leaders" who will subscribe for works in which their autobiographies appear.

Griffiths, Dr. A. B., 171, Brixton-road, London.—Gives analyst's certificates to quack remedies for a fee of a guinea. Has a long string of foreign "honours" and American "degrees" attached to his name, and was at one time "President" of the egregious Society of Science Letters and Art.

Hamilton.—A peripatetic hawker of ear-drums and spectacles in the neighbourhood of Bristol, who charges extortionate prices for his wares.

Ham, J. J.—A swindler who offers to sell a half-share in an old-established business and disappears when the cash put into the business is exhausted.

Hatton, G. R.—Another author who trades on the vanity of noodles. His latest publication is entitled "Men and Women." He has recently assumed the name of Guy Roslyn, and when last heard of was living at Canvey Island, Essex.

International Institute of Physiology and Hygiene, 11, Queen Victoria-street, London, E.C.—Dr. J. Grant Stephen, Director of Laboratories, offers "certificates of analysis," on payment of a fee of one guinea for "registration of the record" to manufacturers and tradesmen who have never before heard of the Institute. The certificates have even been offered to firms for goods which the firms approached have never manufactured.

Legal Aid Society, 37, Walbrook, and Rotherhithe, S.E. (Mr. J. J. Pink, general manager and secretary). — For an annual subscription of 1s. offers free legal advice to its members, the object being to get on its books the names of prospective clients who may one day have claims under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. In one case undertaken by the "Society," out of £150 paid as compensation for the death of a man only £30 reached the widow.

London Hospital for Diseases of the Teeth, 272, Regent-street, W.—Yet another pseudo-benevolent enterprise promoted by a man named F. Sinclair Kennedy, who has been previously connected with the firm of Guy White and Co., and has been fined at Marlborough-street Police-court for infringing the Dentists' Act.

McIntosh, Walter, Ryde Vale-road, Balham.—Purveyor of a realistic-scope (which is an ordinary stereoscope) and suggestive slides for "the smoking-room."

National Old-Age Pension Trust.—A scheme for providing old-age pensions, which is financially rotten. Its originator was a Mr. Wm. Taverner, of the Spurgeon Memorial Society, with whom were associated a number of well-meaning Nonconformist gentlemen, who, after criticism in Truth, took steps to have the scheme wound up under order of the Court. In spite of this, however, Taverner has represented the Trust to be still in existence under a new board of management, and has invited contributions to the funds.

New Thought Publishing Company, Temple Chambers, Temple-avenue, E.C.—Advertises a course of instruction in personal magnetism, described in a volume of preposterous lies and impudent humbug, entitled "The Power Within." It inherits the business of the Psychic Research Company, which commenced a libel action in 1902 against Truth, when its business was described as a swindle, but feared to meet a jury, and the action was dismissed.

"Parisian Inventors' Academy."—A dodge by which one H. E. Boettcher, of 14, Boulevard Saint-Martin, extracts £2 from persons who take out patents in England for "a first-class diploma" and a "great gold medal (gilded)," and the right to write M.P.I.A. after his name.

Parker, Frederick, of "St. Noel's Distributing Syndicate," offers hampers, containing turkey, whisky, port, 100 Havanas, and a Christmas cake as an advertisement to people who send him 5s. for carriage. Uses an accommodation address.

Parsons, J., 31, King-street, Portman-square.—Answers advertisements by people who advertise carriages for sale, and asks for a preliminary fee of £3 3s. for inspecting the vehicle. Writes from an accommodation address.

Scientific Temperance League. — The enterprise of a "Dr. Neumann Thomas," of Ealing. The "Dr." has falsely represented himself to be a graduate of London University, and was previously known as a begging-letter writer. He is a temperance advocate of the Rev. Stiggins type, and was on February 2, 1906, sentenced at Essex Assizes to eighteen months' hard labour for obtaining subscriptions to the League by false pretences.

Thomas, "Rev." R. H. Owen, Clifton.—Offers to forward on approval a very fine genealogical chart, showing the addressees' Royal descents. If it is returned demands £6 6s., on the ground that the document has been damaged.

Trades and Workmen's Legal Aid Society, 6, Whitefriars-street, E.C., and Dartford.—A similar concern to the Legal Aid Society, the Whitefriars-street address being a barber's shop, where the secretary, Mr. H. G. Lane, calls for letters.

Walker, of Manchester.—Describes himself as an auction-room porter who for £3 will procure a fine old mahogany table bearing the name of an ancestor of the gentleman to whom the bargain is offered. Writes from an accommodation address.

Non-Proprietary Swindles and Tricks.

Under this heading I have classed those tricks for obtaining money which are the common property of the artful dodger of all nations. All of them have been successfully worked during the year, and in spite of continuous exposure the variants of the "confidence trick," as practised by "the Spanish Prisoner" and the "Gold Brick Swindler," still continue to obtain many dupes.

Bogus-account Swindle.—A particularly mean type of fraud practised at the expense of the executors of recently deceased persons, to whom accounts for goods supplied or work done on behalf of the deceased are forwarded with a request for settlement. Has recently been operated by reputed dentists and veterinary surgeons.

"Free Portrait" Trick.—Though classed under non-proprietary swindles, this trick of promising a free enlargement of a photograph and then springing a claim for a frame upon the dupe might almost be considered to be the property of the notorious A. Tanquerey, of Paris, whose methods of business and lying testimonials have been continually exposed in Truth for years past. Tanquerey is, however, continually finding imitators, amongst the latest of whom are Eugène Pierson, 15, Rue de la Tarasse, Paris; Reinhard Becker and Co., of 68, Rue Damrémont, Paris; the International Artistic Society, 22, Tavistock-square, London, W.C.; and the Westbourne Art Gallery, Chepstow Mansions, Westbourne-grove, London, W.

"Gold Brick" Swindle. A highly developed variation of the ancient "confidence trick," worked by gangs of thieves in the United States. When any gentleman possessed of considerable property dies in this country, a letter is addressed to him, purporting to refer to some mining enterprise or treasure hunt in which he is interested in conjunction with a third party, whom the writer represents. The letter reports the discovery of rich mines or other treasure, a share in which is to be handed over to the party to whom the letter is written. The letter is, of course, intended to fall into the hands of the deceased gentleman's heirs or executors, who, knowing nothing of the facts, will communicate with the writer in America. The object is to get a representative of the family over to America, and then to obtain from him a heavy cash payment for some purpose connected with the business. By way of security for the cash, the dupe is handed over "bricks," or blocks of what purports to be pure gold. He is invited to test them, and drillings from the blocks which he may take to a jeweller invariably answered to the tests for gold. When, however, the gold bricks are assayed they turn out to be base metal, the trick having been worked either by exchanging the drillings of base metal for gold filings by sleight of hand, or by the inclusion of a small vein of gold in the block in the process of manufacture. Last year a member of one of the gangs was arrested in New York, but the game still goes on merrily.

Luggage-in-Advance Trick.—The object is to obtain payment for carriage and charges by a pretended firm of forwarding agents on behalf of some apocryphal person who is coming to stay at an hotel or boarding-house. It was originally worked from the Continent at the expense of confiding Britishers, but is now largely worked from this country at the expense of foreigners.

"Original Signature" Trick.—This consists of the enclosure of an old autograph with a circular letter addressed to the owner of the signature, informing him that he has been specially selected as the recipient of a handsome article of some sort at a merely nominal price. The autographs are cut from old letters which are purchased in bulk from various sources. Particularly used in the disposal of shoddy watches by, amongst others, the Anglo-American Watch Co., the British Watch Co., and the London and Sheffield Electro-plate Works, all of St. John's-square, Clerkenwell; the Clark Co., Birkbeck Bank-chambers; George Powell and Co., 14, Silver-street, London, E.C.; J. Scattergood and Co., late the Sheffield Workers' Association, 80A, Southampton-street; Brahmo Lever Watch Co., 65, Imperial Buildings, Ludgate-circus, E.C.; and the Observatory Watch and Jewellery Co., 29, Sandycombe-road, Richmond, Surrey.

Patent Editor Trick.—This is usually carried out with the connivance of the proprietors of certain newspapers who benefit to a small extent through the transaction. The newspaper publishes a notice that if any of its readers have an idea for a useful invention the "patent editor" will be pleased to advise upon it. The "patent editor" is a myth. Replies to the notice are forwarded to some disreputable patent agent, whose advice invariably takes the form of a recommendation to pay exorbitant fees for patenting what is most likely to turn out a worthless invention. One of the worst types of these offenders is a man named Ellen, and it is safe to assert that no reputable patent agent will conduct his business on these lines.

Pawn-ticket Trick.—A very old dodge, which usually commences with an advertisement for a loan with good security offered. The good security turns out to be pawn tickets for jewellery, which is represented to be pawned at a third of its value. Promissory notes for the cash advanced are given, but when they fall due the borrower has disappeared. The security when redeemed is then found to be pawned to its full value, if not for more. Not infrequently the pawnbroker is a participant in the fraud, issuing pawn tickets for a larger amount than he has advanced.

"Railway Clearance Sale" Trick.—A dodge for selling shoddy goods, worked by gangs who go about the country and distribute bills at private houses, in the names of imaginary firms, who are said to be commissioned to dispose of unclaimed goods from railway stations, salvage stock from fires, etc. A representative of the "firm" calls subsequently, and exhibits samples of excellent goods at irresistibly low prices, for which he books orders. He next produces some other article, generally a length of dress stuff, which he desires to sell at once for cash, and on the strength of the excellent samples he has already shown, he usually succeeds. The article sold is always worthless rubbish, and nothing more is heard of the other goods ordered, or of the "firm."

Second-hand Piano Trick.—A dodge for selling cheap pianos by advertising them as the property of a gentleman or lady going abroad for one reason or another. Certain makers of pianos produce cheap instruments and dispose of them almost exclusively by this means. The advertiser is simply an agent, living in lodgings or a private house. Numerous addresses from which this trade is regularly carried on have from time to time been given in Truth.

Second-hand Plated Goods Trick.—A similar trick for disposing of shoddy plated goods, furs, clothing, and other articles, manufactured specially for this trade. The advertiser is generally a lady, frequently sporting a title. A favourite dodge is to offer the goods as duplicate wedding presents. Another is to offer them as unredeemed pledges. This trade is carried on from innumerable addresses in London and the suburbs, and also in the provinces. Some of the best-known advertisements appear in the names of Davis and Co., pawnbrokers, of 26, Denmark-hill, and 284, Brixton-road; Allen Davis, of 524, High-road, Chiswick; Miss Andrews, The Gables, Ealing Dean; "Maud," 68, Stockwell-road, S.W.; "Lily," 55, Hanworth-street, S.W.; Mrs. Bradshaw, 2, Claylands-road, S.W.; and Emmanuel and Co., 31, Clapham-road, S.W.

"SPANISH PRISONER" TRICK.—One of the most popular and successful of these swindles. Worked by innumerable thieves, of various degrees of intelligence and cleverness, in different Spanish towns. A letter is written, ostensibly from a prison, the writer claiming some knowledge of, or relationship to, the party he addresses, and frequently using the same family name. He explains that through some complicated circumstances (generally connected with the Cuban insurrection) he has had to bury a large sum of money in some part of England, or deposit it in some English bank. A plan of the hiding place, or the receipt note from the bank, as the case may be, is concealed in his portmanteau, which is deposited outside the prison. He desires the party he addresses to assist him in the recovery of his treasure, in return for a large share in it. A youthful daughter is usually one of his properties, and is to be adopted by his friend, who is to hold the rest of the money for her. Innumerable dodges are employed to give verisimilitude to the tale, which always ends, when "confidence" has been established, with a request for a substantial sum of money to release the portmanteau, that article having been seized by a creditor, or detained by the Custom House authorities, at the critical moment when it is wanted.

WORKING BOYS' HOME TRICK.—A method by which various gangs seek to dispose of cheap tinware and such-like goods all over the country. The parties who work the business engage boys to hawk the articles from door to door, supplying them with literature which states that the articles have been made in the "Home."

MONEYLENDERS AND THEIR TOUTS.

Far more space than I can spare for the purpose would be required for the publication of a full list of the usurers and usurers' touts against whom the public have been warned in TRUTH. Such a list would, indeed, have to contain the names and aliases of the vast majority of the individuals and firms, numbering many hundreds, who are registered under the Moneylenders Act; and all that I can do here is to pillory those bloodsuckers who for one reason or another have come under my notice during the past year or so:—

ADAMS, A. (alias Adam Edelsheim), 13, Regent-street, W., 10, South Side, Clapham Common, and 16, St. Enoch-square, Glasgow.

BASSETT, S., 285, Oxford-street, W.—Real name Barnett; devotes himself specially to the practice of usury among medical men.

BEDFORDSHIRE LOAN COMPANY, THE, 30, Rutland-road, Bedford.—The registered alias and address of Isaac Abrahams, who is closely associated with various usurers and touts in the West End. He has few, if any, superiors as an extortioner. One man who borrowed £170 from Abrahams was bled for interest at the rate of £120 a year until he had paid back £600. He then became a bankrupt, and Abrahams put in a proof against his estate for a further sum of £292!

BERRY, FRANK, 112, Oliphant-street, Queen's Park, W.—An impecunious tout, generally operating from accommodation addresses.

BENNETT, THOMAS, 20, Hand-court, Holborn, W.C.—For a loan of £5, repayable, with £1 for interest, in six weekly instalments of 20s. each, this extortioner required a shopkeeper to give him "by way of security," an assignment of the whole of his stock-in-trade and furniture! His full name is Jabez Thomas Bennett, and he belongs to St. Albans.

BRITISH FINANCE COMPANY, THE, 104, Bignor-street, Hightown, Manchester.—This title is assumed by an unscrupulous scoundrel named Samuel Cohen, while his wife, Rose Cohen, is separately registered as a moneylender under the alias of "Charles Russell." The couple have usury-shops in about a dozen Lancashire and Yorkshire towns.

BOWEN, H. (alias Henry Barnett), 23, Sackville-street, Piccadilly; and 18, Hart-street, Bloomsbury.

CHARING CROSS BANK, THE, 28, Bedford-street, Charing Cross, and 39, Bishopsgate-street Within. A 60 per cent. usury shop run by a man named Carpenter.

COGSWELL, E., 20, Bedford-street, Charing Cross.—A rapacious old rascal whose specialty is the bleeding (if they still possess any cash or assets) of persons against whom bills of sale or judgments are registered. He has had an extensive experience of such judgments himself, and he is personally acquainted with the Bankruptcy Court.

CHALLONER, B. L. (alias Bernard Kletz), Queen's-chambers, 7, Market-street, Manchester; 45, Vernon-street, Bolton; and 53, Kingsley-road, Princes Park, Liverpool.

COUNTY AND ALBION LOAN OFFICE, THE (alias Harry Heron and Bernard Heron), Leeds.

COX AND CO., 229, Seven Sisters-road.—An alias of Arthur George Whiteman, who also trades with his brother as "Seymour and Whiteman."

DAILY INVESTMENT CORPORATION, LIMITED, THE, 38, Finsbury-pavement, E.C.—An offspring of the so-called Carlton Bank which became notorious a few years ago on account of its moneylending operations among the clergy. The "Corporation," like the "Bank," also addresses itself specially to the clergy.

EDWARDS AND CO. (alias Lionel Hart and Bella Lawrence), 17, Sackville-street, W.

ENGLISH AND GENERAL REVERSIONARY CO., Birkbeck Bank-chambers, Holborn.—In combination with Arthur Peel (see below), this concern has been involved in some disgraceful cases, in which advantage has been taken of the ignorance and improvidence of persons entitled to reversions. The principal shareholder in the company is Mrs. Elizabeth Douglas Norman, and Mr. Frederick Douglas Norman, practising as Douglas, Norman, and Co., is the company's solicitor.

EQUITABLE INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, THE.—In return for a loan of £400, repayable in six months, and secured by a mortgage of land worth £850, this company sought to make a lady pay a bonus of £100 in addition to 5 per cent. interest. The Court of Chancery set aside this transaction, the Judge expressing the opinion that it was a swindle.

ELDRIDGE AND MORRIS, 38, Museum-street, W.C.—Touts for "B. S. Thomas," and other bloodsuckers.

EQUITABLE ADVANCE COMPANY, THE (alias Edwin George Wade Moon), Southampton.

FIELDING'S, 1A, Southampton-row, W.C., and elsewhere.—This concern was run originally under the title of "J. S. Fielding and Co.," then it became "Fielding's, Limited," and now it is known simply as "Fielding's." No Fielding has ever been connected with the business, which has always been in the hands of a Hebrew family named Samuel, hailing from Cardiff. For many years Fielding's, who have branch usury-shops in provincial towns, have been notorious as bloodsuckers of the worst type.

FORTESCUE, L., Piccadilly House, 40 and 41, Sackville-street, W.—A newcomer; real name, Abraham Cohen.

FINE, LOUIS, 2, City-chambers, Bristol.

GRANVILLE BANKING AND LOAN SOCIETY, LIMITED, THE (President, H. Granville Carpenter), 573, High-road, Chiswick.—Registered under the Friendly Societies Act, but its charges for small loans are as exorbitant as those of the ordinary usurers.

HARMSWORTH, J., 18, Regent-street, W.—Under this alias a rascal named Lewis Levene, of 20, Clifton-villas, Maida-vale, sends out a circular offering loans "to station-masters only."

HARVEY, W., 17, Cork-street, Burlington-gardens, W., and 9, Cathedral-street, Norwich.—Formerly a tout for "P. Saunders," otherwise Braham and Philip Samuel.

HARRIS, HENRY, 6, Old Cavendish-street, W.—Phineas Henry Emanuel and Henry Michaelson, the extortioners trading under this alias, have branch usury-shops in a number of provincial towns. Emanuel was formerly manager of a now defunct firm of jewellers at Portsmouth which surreptitiously practised usury at the expense of young naval officers.

HENRY, F. (alias Lewis Mayer), 109, Great Russell-street.

HIGNETT, L., 1, Carlton-street, Waterloo-place, S.W.; and 56, Cicada-road, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

HIGGINS, JOHN T., 222, Strand.—Improvident young heirs falling into the toils of this vampire have been fleeced in the most unscrupulous manner. More than once the judges have strongly condemned his practices, and compelled him to disgorge part of his plunder.

HOWARD AND COPE, LIMITED, 3, Holles-street, W.—Another concern preying upon persons with expectations under wills, reversions, settlements, etc. It is run by one Casson Perrott Smith, a solicitor with a very shady record. His certificate was suspended owing to the part that he had played in connection with various discreditable moneylending transactions. He is a bankrupt, whose discharge was in 1903 suspended for the unusually long term of ten years.

JACKSON AND CO., 23, Duke-street.—In private he calls himself Joseph Parker, but his original name was Abrahams.

KING, J., 4, King-street, St. James's.—Three Hebrews named Baron Wolfe, Harry Wolfe, and Harris Blumberg, hailing from Manchester, whose pitiless and unprincipled methods of blood-sucking have often come under judicial notice.

LAWRENCE AND CO., F., 119, Regent-street.—Lewis Teller and Sampson Jacob Goldberg are the harpies doing business under this name.

LESTER, HERBERT, 110, Jermyn-street, S.W.—The alias of one Sanguinetti, a tout against whom TRUTH first warned the public thirty years ago.

LOFTHOUSE AND CO., 119, Victoria-Street, S.W.—The alias (unregistered) of one Abraham Crichton Loftus Tottenham, a notorious shark.

LUBBOCK, JOHN C., 213, Piccadilly, W.—Emily Bannister is registered to trade at this address in the alias of "Matthew (not John C.) Lubbock.' This alias was formerly registered by the above-mentioned Tottenham, and to all intents and purposes the business at 213, Piccadilly, is still his.

LESLIE, R., 35, Old Bond-street, W., and 5, Claremont-road, Surbiton.—Louis Nathan Levene, the individual registered under this alias, is a most rapacious extortioner.

LONDON AND COUNTY LOAN COMPANY, SHEFFIELD.—A rascal named Eli Darlow runs this concern, though one of his children is the nominal proprietor, and in the County Court his wife has been represented as the actual financier. Darlow preys chiefly upon working-class people.

LEWEIN AND Co., H. T., 160, Regent-street, W.

MAGGS, S. (alias Solomon Margolies), 10, Bowling Green-street, Leicester.

MASTERS, A., 35, Brook-street, W.—This is the sole remaining alias of Abraham Lazarus, who formerly set the Moneylenders Act at defiance by trading simultaneously as "Herbert Paget," "Carringtons, Limited," "Mortimers, Limited," and "A. Masters, Limited." For that offence he was fined £100 and costs in July, 1905. Lazarus first became notorious as a bloodsucker about ten years ago, when his headquarters were at Bristol, and he has been responsible for some of the most iniquitous moneylending transactions that have ever been exposed in TRUTH.

MAURICE AND Co. (alias Mark Shaffer), Preston.—Has usury-shops in a number of Lancashire towns.

MORRIS, J., 60, Haymarket, S.W.—An individual who describes himself as an "investment broker, registered under Act of Parliament, 63 and 64 Vict., c. 51." This sounds imposing, but it only means that he is registered as a moneylender.

MURRAY, ALBERT, 9, Old-Cavendish-street, W. — A recent recruit to the ranks of the usurers' touts; real name, Nathan Rosen, of 7, Carlton-vale, Maida-vale, W.

MUTUAL ADVANCE AND INVESTMENT COMPANY, THE (alias Annie Rosenthal), Manchester.

PEEL, ARTHUR, 41, New Oxford-street, W.; 85, Lord-street, Liverpool; and 37, North Castle-street, Edinburgh.—Advertises advances to heirs under wills, etc. His victims are bamboozled into paying an exorbitant commission for the privilege of being passed on to the above-mentioned English and General Reversionary Company.

PICTON, THOMAS (otherwise William Powell), 19, Duke-street, Cardiff.—Traded in his own name until last year, when a crushing exposure in the County Court caused him to assume the alias of "Thomas Picton."

PHILLIPS, L., 31, Gower-street, W.C.; also at Brighton and Tunbridge Wells.

PASSMORE H. (alias Henry Phillips), 9, Red Lion-court, E.C.

PYKE, ALEXANDER, 31, Craven-street, Strand, W.C. — Yet another (and a most appropriately-named) member of the voracious tribe who offer loans upon reversions and life interests.

PROVINCIAL UNION BANK, THE.—The notorious John Kirkwood is the proprietor of the usury-shops which are carried on in a number of provincial towns under this high-sounding and misleading title. Many would-be borrowers have been bled for preliminary fees when there was no intention of making any advance, while when a loan is granted on a bill of sale affording ample security the interest charged is never less than 60 per cent. per annum. Kirkwood calls it "5 per cent. per month," and ignorant people are constantly tricked into supposing that they will only have to pay 5 per cent. per annum.

RAMSAY, D., 215, Piccadilly, W.—In the register of moneylenders he describes himself as Duncan Ramsay Blair, of Broom Warren, Teddington. A shark who sometimes works with "R. Leslie," alias Louis Nathan Levene.

RICHARDS AND Co., 39, Lombard-street, E.C.—William Henry Burgess, who uses this nom de guerre, is a bloodsucker who seeks his prey amongst clerks in banks and public offices. In a case a few months ago the Lord Chief Justice compelled Burgess to disgorge a substantial portion of the plunder he had secured from an unfortunate clerk by a system of intimidation morally indistinguishable from blackmailing.

ROLAND, J. (alias Meyer Freedman), 101, Edgware-road.

RILEY, C., 60, Station-road, Westcliff-on-Sea.

SANDY, THOMAS, 59, East Dulwich-road, S.E.—Styling himself an accountant, this harpy circularises tradesmen with an offer to assist them in obtaining "additional capital." He is simply a usurer's tout.

SEYMOUR AND WHITEMAN, 32, Walbrook, E.C.—Two unmitigated scoundrels named William Herbert Whiteman and Arthur George Whiteman, who practise what is essentially a system of blackmailing, as well as bloodsucking, upon bank clerks, Civil servants, and others. The system is to lure a clerk into their toils and then squeeze him remorselessly by means of direct or indirect threats to report him to his employers, which in many cases would result in his dismissal.

SAUNDERS, P., 11, Savile-row, W., and St. James's-road, Kingston-on-Thames.—Two brothers named Braham and Philip Samuel, belonging to the same family as the notorious "B. S. Thomas," and as usurers exhibiting the same characteristics. In what has now become a leading case in regard to the law of moneylending "P. Saunders" claimed interest at the rate of 418 per cent. upon a loan advanced to a wealthy inebriate at a time when he was unfit to do any business. Mr. Justice Kekewich cut down the interest to 10 per cent. The usurers carried an appeal in this case to the House of Lords, which, in an important judgment on the interpretation of the Moneylenders Act, affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich.

SAGAR, HENRY, 33, Premier House, Dover-street, W.—A commission-snatching rascal, whose dupes are generally handed over to the tender mercies of such bloodsuckers as Isaac Abrahams, "B. S. Thomas," and "P. Saunders."

SELBY, GEORGE (formerly C. Stone), 28, Bloomsbury-street, W.C.—A German Jew, related to the notorious Joel Ford (otherwise Fliegende Taube).

THOMAS, B. S., 4, Adelaide-street, Charing-cross; also at Oxford, Reading, Guildford, and elsewhere.—For years past Charles Samuel, the Hebrew trading as "B. S. Thomas," has been one of the biggest and most voracious of the sharks of usury in London. There have been innumerable exposures of his harsh and unconscionable transactions in the law courts.

TURNER, S. (alias Saul Tumim), 14, Dover-street, Piccadilly, London, and 2, Pall Mall, Manchester.

VIVIAN, RALPH, 80, Wigmore-street, Cavendish-square, W.—Says that he is "an Eton and Oxford man," which, even if true, does not alter the fact that he is now one of those dangerous and disreputable creatures who act as touts for usurers.

WATTS, FRED, 95A, Jermyn-street, Piccadilly, W.; and 150, Friar-street, Reading.—Circulars sent out in this name emanate from one David Freeman, of 36, Honiton-road, Kilburn, London.

WEBBER, R. N., 49, Finsbury-pavement, E.C.—In the register at Somerset House this usurer gives "Arthur Henry Norris" as his real name. As a matter of fact it is Aarons.

WARWICK, J., 36, Albemarle-street, W.—Jack Isaacs is the real name of this tout.

WESTON AND Co., JOHN, 30, Duke-street, St. James's, S.W.—This entry takes the place of those that have appeared in previous cautionary lists under the heading of "Gerald Chesney," 25, Regent-street, W. Henry Trowbridge Pockett was "Gerald Chesney." Quite recently, however, he metamorphosed himself into "John Weston and Co.," and removed to the address in Duke-street. He has been in business as a bloodsucker for many years, though his operations were once suspended while he served a sentence of imprisonment for preliminary-fee frauds.

WILSON AND Co., T., 30, Craven-street, W.C.

WILTON AND Co., JAMES, 199, Piccadilly.—Three of the Wolfe tribe—Jonas, Abraham, and Alexander.

"WOLFE AND Co., H.," and "THE STANDARD LOAN COMPANY."—Further aliases in which (by an evasion of the Moneylenders Act) the partners in the above-mentioned firm of "J. King" carry on their wolfish practices in Manchester and other towns.

WOOLEY, J. (alias Wolfe), 103, Regent-street, W.

YORKSHIRE ADVANCE OFFICE, THE (alias Nathan Cohen), The Chambers, Park-square, Leeds; and 2, Westgate, Barnsley.

BETTING AGENTS, TIPSTERS, AND SYSTEM SWINDLERS.

Parliament has now passed an Act for the suppression of street betting, but, unfortunately, it has not yet done anything to check the operations of the horde of swindling bookmakers, tipsters, and system-mongers who prey upon the credulity of the public. Nowhere can fraud and trickery that is akin to fraud be practised more safely and profitably than on the outskirts of the Turf. Consider, for example, the position of the welsher who poses as a turf accountant or commission agent at an office in the West-End or elsewhere. Although he may conduct his business more or less systematically on the plan of "heads I win, tails you lose," he can snap his fingers at his dupes and the police too. When he fails to pay up, the defrauded backer may, of course, sue him for the debt, but as the Gaming Act will be pleaded any such proceeding merely results in throwing good money after bad. There are, I know, plenty of honest bookmakers. A bookmaker is not, however, necessarily honest because he sends out a circular or advertises in a newspaper, and it is amazing that so many simpletons should be found ready to open betting accounts with men of whom they know nothing beyond what they have learned from such circulars or advertisements. Below are the names of some of the betting agents whom I have had occasion to mention during the past year:—

ANTHONY AND EDGE, 48, Dover-street, W.—Victimised a number of backers last summer. Information was given to Scotland Yard, but the reply was that "the police did not deal with gambling transactions."

AYCKBOURN, R., Trafalgar-buildings, 1, Charing Cross-road, W.C.—A welsher.

CHALLIS AND Co. (alias Robert Wilson), Balfour House, Finsbury-pavement.—Sought to evade payment of a debt by setting up the defence of the Gaming Act, which led Judge Lumley Smith to remark that Wilson "admitted that he was a rogue."

DE COSTA, I., 39, Bond-street, Brighton.—Did business illegally on the deposit system.

DRAKE, JOE, St. Leonards, and Flushing.

GRANT, FRANK, 7, Union-court, E.C., and The Hague, Holland.—Prosecuted by the City Police and fined £100 for running his business on the deposit system. Besides breaking the law in that way, he also welshed some of his clients.

MAGNUS, ARTHUR, Flushing, Holland.—Started a Continental office after being fined at Liverpool for conducting a deposit-system business.

MAY AND CO., R., 63, Tamworth-road, Croydon, and 12A, Brewer-street, London, S.W.

MURRAY, COOPER, AND CO., 13, Sackville-street, W.—So long ago as 1902 a swindling bookmaker was using this alias. He revived it again last year, and again defrauded a number of backers.

NASH AND CO., 6, Lisle-street, Leicester-square.—Another welsher.

NEVIL, G. H., 10, Paradise-street, W.—When asked for money which he has failed to pay on settling day this welsher wires pretending that there has been an oversight, and promising to put the matter right. Meanwhile he invites the backer to continue betting. If the backer falls into this booby-trap the probability is that his winning account will be thereby converted into a losing one. In that event he goes on doing business—that is, paying his losses—to the bookmaker without realising that he has been tricked. On the other hand, if the further bets happen to increase the amount due to him from the bookmaker, the latter can still welsh him just as easily as before. Another of Nevil's dodges for gaining time is to put up a clerk to state that he is dangerously ill.

ROBERTS, W., Brockley.—A "turf accountant" who also turns his attention to betting on football matches.

SHERWARD, JOHN, 91, Crown-road, Twickenham.—A "turf accountant" censured in TRUTH for circularising the grooms at a country house.

THOMAS AND CO., ARTHUR, 51, Bishopsgate-street Within, E.C.—Offered to pay an Army officer if he would "influence" his fellow officers to do business with them.

WALLACE, R. B., 239, High Holborn, W.C.

Lord Durham has denounced the whole tribe of circularising and advertising tipsters as scoundrels, a curse to the Turf and to the country. This is strong language but not a bit too strong, for through the tipsters' essentially fradulent pretences in regard to their sources of information and the infallibility of their tips hosts of simpletons who cannot afford to risk their money are beguiled into the ruinous habit of backing horses. Here are the names of some of the false prophets of the Turf whom I have pilloried during the past year:—

BESTON, E. W., Brighton.—For some years now this individual has been notorious as the most mendacious and unprincipled rogue among the shady fraternity of touting tipsters, outdistancing all his rivals in the extent of his raids upon the pockets of the gullish herd of backers. He uses many accommodation addresses in Birmingham and the neighbourhood, and the list of his aliases is too long to be given in full, but I may mention that among the names he has assumed are those of "Dan Bruce," "Miss Flossie Beresford," "Percy Macdonald," "James Brown," "E. Allsopp," "George Graham," "John Bull," "George Leslie," "Walter Hooley," "Reginald Vernon," "Fred A. Black," "Lionel G. Milton," "Lucky Joe," "Jupiter," "Walter Owen," "Captain George Somerville," "George Westwood," "Nat Thomas," "Herbert Gordon," and "The Major." Besides issuing circulars and advertisements in these aliases, this Protean rascal has also from time to time published swindling journals under the titles of The Midland Referee, The Winning Guide, The Racing Champion, The Starter, The Thunderbolt, Stable Secrets, The Secret Special, and The National Sportsman. One of his dodges is to trap the unwary into subscribing for these rags (for which a high price is charged) by distributing bogus "specimen copies" purporting to have been published before some big race, but actually printed after the result was known and the name of the winner could be inserted as a "prediction."

"COURSE AND CLUB," Red Lion-square, London.

FELLOWS, R., 28, Upper George-street, Hyde Park.—A sharp using an accommodation address.

GOODWIN, HARRY, Ashley House, Newmarket.

HORNSBY, FRED, Newmarket House, South Norwood.

LOVATT, PAUL, "V. S.," 121, Dulwich-road, Herne Hill.

MILLS, GEORGE, 49, Newgate-street, E.C.—Issues a tipster's sheet of the usual worthless and misleading character, called "The Turf Speculator."

MOORE, J., 34, Leigh-road, Westcliff-on-Sea.

NEWMARKET RACING EXCHANGE, Parliament-chambers, S.W.

PIZZEY, M. B., Heath Villa, Ascot.—At one time Pizzey, as a touting tipster, was able to trade upon the fact that he owned some racehorses, but owing to the comments of TRUTH the Jockey Club put an end to that scandal. Pizzey ceased to be an owner and was reduced to the position of an ordinary tipster—a very ordinary tipster, judging from the persistence with which his most cocksure predictions are falsified by the event.

PRITCHARD, J. (alias Selfe), Vue Tamise, Putney, S.W.

RICHARDSON, W., 12, Grenville-street, Brunswick-square, W.C.

TOWER, TOM, Maidenhead.—One subscriber to this prophet's "Imperial One-Horse Wires" got four winners out of thirty-five telegrams.

TAYLOR, HAWLEY, 12, Old Burlington-street, W.

WILLING AND CO., 41, Stafford-street, N.W.—A harpy having, of course, no right to the name he impudently assumed.

YATES, WALTER, 82, Grovesnor-street, W.

"Z," "CONSTITUTIONAL," Upton, Torquay.—This tipster adorns his card with the inscription "Direct Club Connection, R.C., N.S.R., C.C." It is surmised that the last two initials stand for Common Cheat.

The following are some of the betting system harpies against whom I have specially warned the public. It is evident that there are a great number of greenhorns ready, not only to believe in the existence of infallible systems of betting, but to hand over their cash without security or inquiry to any stranger offering to invest it in the working of a system:—

ARNOLD AND WOOD, The Hague, Holland.—Offer to work any betting system—if you will trust them with your money.

BRAIN BROTHERS, 3, City-road, E.C.

DAWSON, JOHN G., Bushberry, Wolverhapton.—This self-styled "turf accountant and stable commissioner" invited subscriptions for shares in what he called "mutual books," the capital entrusted to him to be used in both backing and laying operations, which, according to his account, were so arranged that a profit was bound to be made. Needless to say, the capital (also according to his account) was lost, and the "guarantee" that he had given to the guileless shareholders proved to be worthless.

"FRIAR FRANCIS," 27, Addycomb-terrace, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Invites greenhorns to pay him £5 5s. for the secret of an infallible system.

"JOCKEY'S OPINION," Sandland-street, London.—Practises the same swindle as "Turf News."

LESTER, J. A., 25, Richmond-road, E.C.—Uses as his lure the old, fallacious, discredited first-favourite system, promising a profit of 10s. a week on each £5 handed over to him for "investment."

NORTH, ERNEST, Winchester House, High-street, Hull.—A system swindler who ought to have been prosecuted by the local police.

SECURITY INVESTMENT SOCIETY, THE, 28, Damrak, Amsterdam,—The usual betting-system fraud.

"TURF NEWS," Hand-court, London.—By means of mendacious advertisements in provincial newspapers the rascal trading under the above title has bamboozled many greenhorns into paying him 20s. for a "wonderful system," which is, in fact, the absolutely unworkable one of "backing the last horse named in the betting returns."

WOOD, C., 148, Old-street, E.C.—A swindler who promises a return of 4s. per week on each £1 entrusted to him for "investment."

To complete this section of my Cautionary List I must add a general warning against the numerous so-called "competitions" and sweepstakes in connection with racing and football which are carried on from offices on the Continent, mostly in Holland. Some are downright swindles and there is no real security that any of them are honestly conducted.

BUCKET-SHOP KEEPERS AND SHARE-PUSHERS.

Appended is a list of various firms and individuals against whom the public have been warned by the City Editor of TRUTH. It will be seen that in spite of occasional prosecutions by the police there has been little or no diminution in the number and the activity of the bucket-shop brigade, nor is it to be expected that such sharks will cease to infest the City so long as the public afford them such easy prey. There seems to be an inexhaustible number of flats always ready to send money in to any plausible rogue who promises to return a big profit, no matter how ludicrously incredible his statements may be. Very often, too, the bucket-shop is closed and the proprietor has vanished (only, of course, to reappear elsewhere under a new alias) before the police make up their minds to take action—a process which might surely be quickened in most cases:—

BLYTHE, GOULD, AND CO., 25, Lawrence-lane; THE GLOBE AND LANCASHIRE STOCK EXCHANGE (same address); GORDON, RICHMOND, AND BROTHER, Imperial-buildings; and FIFE, HAMILTON, AND CO., 42, New Bridge-street. — Bucket-shops run by two swindlers, named Edward Wilfred Donnalton (alias E. Pellett) and John Hollingworth.

BULL, MARTIN, 7, Fenchurch-buildings, E.C.—One of the most blatant members of the bucket-shop brigade. Women are always the favourite prey of these gentry, and Bull has more than once shown himself to be a particularly dangerous creature by directing his misleading circulars to girls under age. From time to time I have had complaints from customers of this man, who, having been so exceptionally lucky as to make a profit, were unable to get the cash from him.

CASSELL AND LANGTON, 34-36, Gresham-street, E.C.—Describing themselves as stock and share brokers, these people from time to time issue circulars inviting strangers to advance a client of theirs a loan of £200 for a month, the client offering £25 for the accommodation, giving as security over £600 worth of fully paid up preference shares in a sound dividend paying company. Obviously a "ramp."

CHARLES AND CO., Moorgate-street, E.C.—For two years past I have published warnings against this bucket-shop harpy (real name, Frederick Speigel), whose flagrantly dishonest methods of business ought to have long since received the attention of the police. In one of the last cases which I noticed Charles obtained £25 from a victim by deluding him with a statement that "there was no limit to the time shares might remain open," and then compulsorily closing the account the moment the cover was exhausted.

MORGAN CORCORAN, MESSRS., 14, Great Winchester-street, E.C.—Recommend purchases on "reliable news from exceptionally well-informed quarters," which, needless to say, proves to be erroneous.

COVENTRY AND CO., CHARLES, Trafalgar-buildings, Northumberland-avenue, W.C.—A notorious bucket-shop.

CURRIE AND CRISP, 68-70, Queen-street, E.C.

CLEMENT AND HAYES, 19, Buckingham-street, W.C.

CUNLIFFE, RUSSELL, AND CO., Paris.—For years past the people trading under this name have been engaged in selling Continental government and municipal premium or lottery bonds at exorbitant prices to customers unaware of the fact that such bonds can be procured on more advantageous terms through various reputable channels in London. In a number of cases Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. have been sued in the Paris Courts and compelled to refund the money they had obtained from victims in this country. As to the bonds, even the best of them only offer a very meagre direct return with a very remote chance of winning a prize. The pretence that the bonds afford a good investment is preposterous; they merely provide a very unsatisfactory method of gambling.

DOUGLAS, CAIRN, AND CO., Crown-court, Old Broad-street, E.C.—Bucket-shop philanthropists of the usual type.

FINANCIAL GUARDIAN, THE, 2, Tokenhouse-buildings, E.C.—My cautionary list for 1904 contained a warning against "Chalmers and Cox," who, from this address distributed grossly deceptive circulars respecting the big profits that could be made by buying shares, such as Rio Tintos, just before the payment of the dividend. "Chalmers and Cox" disappeared, but last year precisely the same game was being played from the same address, under the new name of the Financial Guardian.

FRY AND CO., 34, Coleman-street, E.C.—In September this bucket-shop was closed, probably in order that the firm might start another elsewhere under a new alias.

FOREIGN LOTTERY AGENTS.—The public have been repeatedly warned in TRUTH against the German and other foreign lottery agents, usually styling themselves "bankers," whose circulars are distributed in this country. Not only is the business illegal here, but it is open to objection on other grounds. Some of these agents are downright swindlers. Practically all of them issue prospectuses which are grossly misleading, in regard to the conditions upon which the lotteries are conducted. As a rule, the first payment for which the agent asks only admits to the first of a series of drawings, and it is not until several successive tickets have been taken, at a cost of several pounds, that the holder gets a chance of winning a prize which (after the deduction of the usual charges) will be worth having. There are then enormously long odds against him, amounting in the last stage to about 100,000 to 1.

FREEBORN, FRANKLIN, AND CO., 12, Bank-street, Manchester.

GLASS, R. E., 8, Union-court, Old Broad-street, E.C.—Was engaged in peddling the shares of a Yankee concern, called the Big Four Mining and Milling Company, of Deadwood, South Dakota.

HANMER AND CO., MESSRS., Mellor's-buildings, Liverpool, and the Royal Exchange, Manchester.—Sent out a circular recommending a speculation in cotton futures—a business which amateurs should leave severely alone.

HENNEQUIN, EDWARD C., 8, Park-avenue, Ilford.—This benevolent gentleman, having heard that certain shares were likely to rise to £4, wished to get rid of fifty at 17s. 6d. each!

HUMBERT, WILLIAM, NEPHEW AND CO., Wardrobe-chambers, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.—Distribute the usual bucket-shop literature, and carry on the usual bucket-shop business.

IVES, ANDERSON, AND CO., 51, Bishopsgate-street Within.—Have what they call an "ideal system" account, which is of the old familiar, delusive type.

IMPERIAL STOCK AND SHARE EXCHANGE, 19-21, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.—For a year or two past this firm seems to have been able to find fools to believe their heroic stories of "special stock deals," realising in a few days a profit ranging from a modest £8—that appears to be about the minimum—to as much as £22 on every £10 subscribed. The dupes who expect that they are going to get such a return upon any money that they send to these philanthropists certainly need the lesson they receive.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITIES SYNDICATE, THE, 23, Westminster Palace Gardens, S.W.—Some time ago these people were anxious to make money for guileless strangers by means of "operations" in French Rentes. More recently they have been flooding the country with seductively worded circulars and pamphlets counselling investments in foreign municipal and other premium or lottery bonds, for which, like the above-mentioned firm of Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., they ask a most excessive price. A few weeks ago the syndicate were prosecuted under the Lottery Acts, but though the charge failed the magistrate took occasion to warn the public of the exorbitance of the prices charged for the bonds. And this, of course, is not the only or the most cogent reason for avoiding firms of this kind.

IREDALE AND CO., J. HENRY, 12, Rumford-place, Liverpool.—Were last year pushers of shares in various obscure Welsh gold mining and other companies.

INDUSTRIAL TRUST AND ASSETS CORPORATION, LIMITED, THE, 50, Cannon-street, E.C.

MACKENZIE, JOHN B., 22, Rood-lane, E.C.—"The small investing classes," Mackenzie wrote in one of his innumerable circulars, "show a lamentable lack of foresight in choosing their investments." Very true, and the best evidence of this lack of foresight is the fact that so many small investors are gammoned into transferring their money to the pockets of harpies like Mackenzie.

MELVILLE, GLYN, AND CO., Paris.—Carry on the same business as Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., in much the same way.

MILNE, SON, AND HAMILTON, 11, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.—Another bucket-shop.

MORGAN, ROLAND, 33, Old Broad-street, E.C.—For two guineas a week he would impart his valuable advice by wire or letter, Being a "successful operator," he did not do this as a means of making a living, but simply because "it is good for a man to be continually employed." A very likely story.

MALABAR RUBBER PLANTATIONS, LIMITED, 45, Finsbury-square, E.C.—A concern offering to sell "rubber land in Malabar, Southern India," at £40 per acre (payable £5 down and £2 10s. quarterly), the price to include "planting and cultivating the trees till they are ready for tapping"!

METROPOLITAN STOCK, SHARE, AND DEBENTURE ASSOCIATION, THE, 257, High Holborn, W.C.—This bucket-shop was run by one, Arthur H. Mowbray.

MINING AND GENERAL INVESTMENTS CORPORATION, THE.—The office of the parties using this high-sounding title was situated at Hounslow.

LONDON AND BRITISH STOCK AND SHARE EXCHANGE, THE, 79, Queen-street, E.C.—Recently came out with a long-winded circular containing the usual fairy tales of the "splendid success" that had been achieved "week after week" with "our special stock operations," in which they were, of course, unselfishly desirous that strangers should participate.

LONDON AND SCOTTISH STOCK EXCHANGE, THE, 20, Bucklersbury, E.C.—The "stock union scheme of operating" is this bucket-shop's euphemism for the customary blind pool.

SHIPWORTH AND WATSON, 2, Dunedin-house, Basinghall-avenue, E.C.—Details were given in TRUTH of a case in which these people swindled a lady in connection with a purchase "on margin" of Canadian Pacifics.

STOCK EXCHANGE INVESTMENT AND GENERAL AGENCY, LIMITED, THE, 3, Crosby-square, E.C.—Subscriptions were invited by Mr. E. Preston, the managing director of the agency, for a blind pool operation, which was the subject of a warning in TRUTH. Mr. Preston protested against this, but I considered that the warning was justifiable.

TYLER AND CO., WILLIAM, Pinners House, Old Broad-street, E.C.—Bamboozle ignorant people with stories of the large profits that can be made by buying shares on which large dividends have been declared, but not yet paid, the fact that the dividend will be deducted from the quoted price being, of course, studiously ignored.

have stood out lately amongst Brazilian Rails. Owing to the movement of a heavy coffee crop and the fact that the comparison is now being made against a period when the Company suffered severely from floods, current earnings look very fine. Already since the beginning of the year the receipts amount to £68,000, an advance of £18,600, and the Company is likely to continue forging ahead for some weeks to come. There is some talk, too, of the dividend in respect of 1906 being raised from 4 to 4½ per cent., though on this point it would perhaps be well not to count too confidently, because while the Company showed an increase in gross earnings for the twelvemonth of £55,000, it will have to set against this the provision required to meet the balance of special expenditure entailed by the floods—a matter estimated at £45,000. It is not unlikely that Leopoldinas may have a further moderate rise between now and May, when the annual accounts are published. Whether the stock is worth locking away is, however, another matter, seeing that certain sections of the line will rather more than forty years hence revert (without payment) to the State Government in connection with guarantees now being received. Negotiations have for some time been proceeding with a view to modifying this arrangement, but up to the present nothing tangible appears to have resulted, and in any case it is unlikely that the Company will be able to induce the Government to waive its reversionary claim to the property without offering something in return that must materially affect the position of the stockholders. Guayaquil and Quito Railway Six per Cent. bonds have shown marked weakness. The January coupon has been paid—a month late—but the struggle experienced in meeting it is making bond-holders wonder how the money is to be got together to pay the next coupon. Judging by the Foreign Office report upon the trade of Ecuador, published the other day, the outlook is by no means alluring.

Kaffir Business on a Small Scale, but a Firm Undertone Maintained—Deep Levels Show Signs of Increased Attention—Diamonds Irregular.

Business in the Kaffir market, as in other sections, has been restricted by the uncertainty surrounding the outlook for American Rails, while for a time the apprehension felt with regard to the outcome of the settlement consequent upon the heavy differences which had to be met in some quarters also rendered speculators chary of increasing their commitments. Liquidation has been in progress, and the Kaffir market has not escaped altogether from the pressure, but, considering the lack of fresh support from outside, and that the leading houses have apparently left the market to look after itself, it must be said that this department has well withstood the adverse influences. No material relapse in prices has occurred, while on any signs of improvement in the general outlook the Kaffir speculative favourites have not been slow to show a tendency to advance. This affords evidence that the market is still in a healthy condition, and augurs well for the time when the "shops" may deem it propitious to lend support and start a fresh upward movement. But for the time being the uncertainty surrounding the American outlook seems likely to restrict speculation in the Kaffir and other markets. Some disappointment has been occasioned by the Gold Trust financial statement, though the passing of the dividend had been generally anticipated, in view of the further fall in South African Mining descriptions during the past year, and of the fact that the Company received no dividend last November on its large holding of Gold Fields shares. The profit balance of £57,019 announced by the Gold Trust Directors in respect of the past year's operations, compares with more than twice that sum a year ago, and unfortunately it has again been necessary to write off a very large amount—£364,456—for depreciation. Since the accounts were made up, however, there has been some improvement among the shares in which the Gold Trust is largely interested, and there seems reason to hope that the Company will be able to improve its position during the current year. Below I give a short table of prices of the leading speculative counters of the Kaffir market—the more comprehensive list will be published next week—and it will be seen that Gold Trusts exhibit the largest movement:—

Share.	Jan. 26, 1907.	Feb. 2, 1907.	Rise or Fall.
Apex	4¼	4⅜	+ ⅛
Consolidated Gold Fields	4⅝	4¾	+ ⅛
East Rand	4¼	4⅜	+ ⅛
Geduld	2⅜	2⅜	—
Joh. Consolidated Investment	1¼	1⅛	− ⅛
Modderfontein (£4)	6⅝	6⅝	—
Randfontein	1⅜	1⅜	− ⅛
Rand Mines	7⅛	7⅜	+ ⅛
S. A. Gold Trust	2⅛	2¼	− ⅛

In regard to the labour outlook, further encouragement has been derived from the cabled summary of a speech made by Sir Richard Solomon, who appears to have modified his attitude on the Chinese question. According to the published report of his speech, he has come into line with the leaders of Het Volk in so far as he advocates the repatriation of the coolies only when they can be replaced by substitutes. This news has strengthened the belief in market circles that the present uncertainty as regards the labour outlook for the Rand mining industry will be satisfactorily removed at no very distant date, though there are still some who are sceptical as to the Boers subsequently practising what they are now preaching. Providing the labour supply is not interfered with, it is to be expected that greater activity will be displayed by those responsible for the management of the Rand gold mining industry. Some mines have been shut down on account of the uncertain outlook and of the difficulty of raising fresh funds pending a settlement of the important question of labour. Were the labour question assured, those in control would probably see their way to find the necessary money to restart operations. In view of my remarks last week as to the prospect of Deep Levels attracting more speculative attention in the early future, it is of interest to note that these descriptions have during the past week exhibited signs of going ahead, and when business generally becomes more brisk it seems probable that the Deeps will come in for a good share. Some further information has come to hand by cable respecting the South Rand development. A check borehole has been sunk, and while the results are not quite so high as the average of those previously announced, they are of value as affording additional evidence of the continuity of the reefs. A large amount of capital will be necessary to develop and equip this property, and to my mind this fact tends to increase the prospect of an amalgamation scheme being put forward eventually. As regards other Deep Level proportions, it is reported that the Cinderella Deep is opening up in a gratifying manner, and a cable just to hand from the Knight Central states that recent developments in that mine show considerable improvement. Turning to the list of producing deep levels, it is worth noting that the Robinson Deep has got its full complement of 300 stamps working, and in the current month or March this mine should begin to show its great capabilities as a gold-winner. At present the two principal contributors to the Rand gold output are the Simmer and Jack and the Robinson, but when it gets into its full stride the Robinson Deep will probably assume the premier position. It is expected that the 300 stamps will treat 40,000 to 45,000 tons of ore per month, and an estimate has been made that the monthly profits should be about £47,800. In this event something like £525,000 per annum should be available for distribution among the shareholders, after making allowance for the profits tax. A dividend of 50 per cent. per annum would require £490,000, and would represent a return of rather more than 9 per cent. upon the current market price of the shares. The principal Diamond descriptions have continued to participate in a very fair amount of business, but have shown no decided general tendency. No more has been heard about the De Beers new issue, with which rumour was busy recently. The latest market report is that De Beers and Jagersfontein are to be amalgamated, but the story—which, I believe, has been circulated on more than one previous occasion—has received little credence. Premiers have shown a better tendency, in view of a report as to favourable developments, an unofficial cable stating that several new rich zones have been encountered in the eastern portion of the mine. New Vaal Rivers have fluctuated widely, profit-taking following any marked advance.

Chartered Fairly Active, but Rhodesians Generally Quiet—Little Change Among Prices.

Chartered have received a fair amount of attention, but Rhodesians generally have been very quiet, the market still awaiting a stimulus; and meanwhile prices fluctuate within narrow limits. On the whole the tendency during the past week has been rather dull in the absence of fresh support, but Chartered have kept pretty steady throughout, and on balance it will be seen show no net change:—

I understand that the Chartered report, which is awaited with so much interest, is not likely to be issued for a few weeks, so that market men and shareholders have some time yet wherein to exercise patience. In the meantime, it may be of interest to recall the official anticipations that have been indulged in in respect of the period covered by the forthcoming report. It was originally estimated that the revenue of Southern Rhodesia for the year ended March, 1906, would be £518,550, and the expenditure £531,349, as against the actual amounts of £456,385 and £590,139 respectively for the previous twelve months. Subsequently it was announced that it was possible that there might be a small surplus instead of a deficit, and a little later, at the meeting of the Chartered Company last March, the chairman definitely stated that "for the first time since 1896 the revenue from Southern Rhodesia will have balanced the expenditure in that territory during the financial year ending on the 31st of the present month." In respect of Northern Rhodesia it was estimated the revenue would be £58,125 and the expenditure £148,306, and while the actual figures to be announced may be a little more satisfactory it will be recognised that Northern Rhodesia has still much progress to make before the Chartered Company will be free from financial strain in respect of it. Of course, Southern Rhodesia has yet to reach the stage of a self-supporting state considered from an administrative point of view. If it has ceased to make demands upon the Chartered Company's cash working capital, that result can only have been attained by the application of some of the commercial revenue from that territory to meet the administrative deficit.

Westralians Receive Rather More Attention—Sharp Advance in Horseshoes—Sons of Gwalia and Cosmopolitan Developments.

Rather more business has been transacted in the Westralian market during the past week than hitherto of late, speculative interest having been stimulated by the receipt of news from one or two of the mines, while in addition rumour has been rife in regard to one of the usually most active shares. As regards movement in price, Golden Horseshoes have been the chief feature. These shares have scored a substantial advance, and various stories have been circulated in explanation of the spurt. Very favourable developments in the mine have been talked of, while according to a second rumour the rise in the shares was due to buying in anticipation of the early issue of the Directors' report, which, it was asserted, would be found to make an excellent showing as regards the ore reserve's position. The report is not usually issued till April, so that it will be very early if it does make its appearance this month. A third rumour was that a large speculator in Paris had been caught short of the shares. While Horseshoes exhibit a large advance on the week—a portion of which, however, has since been lost, as the favourable rumours have not been confirmed—it will be seen from the following table that the other leading Westralians have only altered slightly:—

* Allowing for deduction of dividend.

The allusion made above to news received from the mines has reference to the cables issued by the Sons of Gwalia and Cosmopolitan Proprietary Companies. The shares of the latter sharply advanced on the publication of the cable, but Sons of Gwalia have been neglected, the importance of the developments announced apparently not being recognised. They are, however, significant and should not be ignored by shareholders, as they improve the prospects of the mine to by no means a trifling extent. The position appears to be that the new southern ore chute located a few months ago at the No. 7 level in the Sons of Gwalia has now been proved at the No. 9 and the No. 13 levels. The widths reported so far are very satisfactory, while the values if not high are payable. It remains, of course, to be seen to what extent the ore-reserves will be augmented by the development of the new chute; meantime the cabled news affords considerable encouragement to shareholders who, in the last twelve months, have had to face a reduction of output and of the rate of dividend. There has recently been some talk of the next dividend having possibly to be still further reduced to 9d. per share compared with recent distributions of 1s. per share, and as the mine has not yet been able to increase its output it is by no means certain that the lower figure will not have to be declared. Even 9d. per quarter, however, would represent a yield of about 11 per cent. on the current price of the shares, and it does not seem probable that the directors would be obliged to keep down the rate at that figure for more than one quarter. The prospect of enjoying a new lease of life is also held out to the Cosmopolitan, judging from the latest cable from the mine, which announces the proving of over 30 ft. of payable ore of good width on the extension of the No. 11 level. A few weeks ago the Company announced that crushing operations had been temporarily suspended pending the opening up of the southern ore chute in the No. 12 level and the prospecting of the new northern leases by the extension of the Nos. 9 and 11 levels. Already shareholders' hopes are raised by the cable now to hand, and, besides, there is ground for hope that work at the No. 12 level will also prove something satisfactory. Ore of 5 dwts. value (£1 per ton) is profitable to work at the Cosmopolitan, thanks to the reduction in costs the managers have been able to effect, so that if any quantity of the material going over £4 per ton is proved, the Company will do well. The fortunes of the "Cosmop." are not, however, solely dependent upon its Westralian property. As I mentioned the other week, it is acquiring the Phœnix tin mine in Cornwall, and, in addition, it has a one-quarter interest in a deep lead proposition which will probably be floated when times are propitious. As the Company still has a large sum of cash in hand the price ruling for the shares appears to allow little or nothing for possibilities. London and W. A. Explorations have moved in sympathy with Zincs, in which, as I mentioned last week, the Company has a large holding. The Company has also a considerable share interest in the Australian Commonwealth Trust, and therefore stands to benefit from any fresh upward movement in the Deep Leads group. Further, the L. and W. A. Exploration has, like the Cosmopolitan, a one-quarter interest in a deep lead property. Deep Leads remain inactive and seem likely to continue so for a while longer, as I understand that news as to entering the "wash" at the Loddon Valley, on which interest is centred, is not expected to come to hand for about a month yet.

Little Change in West Africans—Broken Hills and Coppers Irregular—Zincs Again Active—Waihi Results—Siberian Props. Further Slump.

While very little change has occurred among the prices of the principal West Africans, the market has not been stagnant during the past week, and dealers appear to still be hopeful of interest in these descriptions broadening in the early future. It is argued that prices here are at such a low level that little or nothing is allowed for possibilities. The current market value of Prestea Block A, for instance, is said to be fully represented by the ore actually developed. The Broken Hill group has been active, and prices have moved irregularly. Zincs have continued to receive chief attention among these descriptions. At first it seemed as though those interested in forcing down the price of Zincs would have things all their own way. Adverse rumours were again freely circulated, weak "Bull" speculators were frightened into realising, and the market was in such a nervous state that dealers were rather encouraged to become short of the shares. Thursday, however, witnessed a marked change for the better. Instead of persisting that the plant was a failure, the rumour-mongers took the opposite line, and a statement was spread through the market that a cable had been received to the effect that the Corporation was proved to be a commercial success. This naturally gave rise to uneasiness among those who were short, and a scramble to repurchase ensued. This they did not find very easy at prices satisfactory to themselves, the "Bull" account having been considerably reduced, and insiders not being at all anxious to supply the demand and thus relieve the position of those who had been doing their best to destroy confidence in the undertaking. Consequently, there was a sharp recovery in the quotation. It will probably be a week or more before the whole of the new plant is got into proper working order, and in the interim fresh attempts may be made to force down the shares in order to enable those who are desirous of getting in to do so to better advantage, but any relapse is likely to be only of a temporary character. Those in the best position to form an opinion are confident of the success of the enterprise, and that this confidence is shared by many others is indicated by the fact that an extremely large number of the shares was taken off the market at the settlement last week. The other Broken Hill shares have for the most part moved in sympathy with Zincs. After being weak they have rallied, the market being all the better for the reduction in the "Bull" account recently effected. Block 10's have been a strong feature, the latest return being regarded as highly satisfactory. This mine is in a very strong position in regard to the important matter of ore reserves, and the price of the shares has hitherto only been kept back by the possibility of another "creep." Now, however, the fears of serious trouble in the event of another movement in the workings seem to have been dispelled. The leading Copper shares have been very irregular, having been to some extent influenced by the tendency of the American market. The latest metal statistics are very satisfactory, a reduction being shown of no less than 3,470 tons in visible supplies of copper on the fortnight. This should help to keep up the prices of the shares of the principal producing mines and encourage speculation in Copper shares generally. Arizonas have benefited from a satisfactory dividend announcement, 3s. per share being declared on the Ordinary, which makes 5s. 3d. in all for 1905-6, or 105 per cent. For 1904-5 the distributions totalled 3s. 9d. per share, or 75 per cent. It is confidently expected that a further material advance in profits will be scored by this Company during the current year. Now that the weak "Bull" element seems to have been shaken out of the market in the Australian Copper descriptions which have been introduced on the market here during the last few months, there is a better tendency in evidence. Mount Lyells, as expected, have picked up, satisfactory news as to developments continuing to come to hand. Some of the smaller-priced issues have also been in fair request. There has been some talk of a probable early dividend being declared by the Mungana (Chillagoe), the amount foreshadowed being 2s. per share; but I have made inquiries in quarters usually well-informed with regard to the Australian propositions, and I am unable to confirm this rumour. My information is that there is not likely to be a dividend on Munganas until after the close of the current financial year, which terminates at the end of June next, and that it is improbable that the first distribution will be more than 1s. per share. However, the Mungana has of late improved its position very considerably, and possibly by the end of this year may have announced distributions amounting in all to 2s. per share, while it is considered probable that eventually the Company will be able to earn profits at the rate of 3s. to 4s. per share per annum, or 60 to 80 per cent. on its capital, the shares being of the nominal value of 5s. each. A little improvement is noticeable here and there among Tin shares. Dolcoaths are a very firm market awaiting the Directors' report, which, as the preliminary output figures and the dividend have indicated, will be a very satisfactory one. The document is being awaited with more than ordinary interest in view of the important deal recently announced in connection with the mineral rights of the estate on which the Dolcoath and other mines are situated. It is understood that the Dolcoath Company is to be given the opportunity of paying a lump sum in commutation of the royalty payable to the new owners of the mineral rights, and it is wondered what policy the Directors will advise the shareholders to adopt. The Directors of the Briseis Tin Mines have declared another dividend, but it has had little effect upon the price of the shares. When the Company's bank balance was on the wrong side the shares were actively dealt in both here and in the Colony, but now that the deficit has been cleared off, and the Company has settled down to paying quarterly dividends, the shares receive scarcely any attention. For 1906 four dividends of 9d. per share and a bonus of a like amount have been paid, or 3s. 9d. in all, and the distribution just announced is the first on account of the current year. The price of the shares, however, remains at such a level that they yield a return of not far short of 30 per cent. per annum. The prospects of the undertaking are, of course, speculative, though not much more so than those of the majority of mining enterprises. Waihis show a little improvement, the announcement of the usual quarterly dividend of 3s. per share serving to direct some attention to the shares. In announcing the dividend, the Company issues a summary of the working results of the past year which shows that the amount of ore treated has steadily increased, and that the total quantity dealt with in 1906 amounted to 328.866 tons, compared with 298,531 tons in the preceding year. The yields, as cabled, totalled £786,474 for the past year, compared with £728,521 actually realised for the 1905 output. It appears that the Waihi is "going strong" on tube mills. It has nine in use, and six more are being made, the intention being to work them in conjunction with the 200-stamp mill. This indicates further expansion of ore treatment, but it does not necessarily follow that the rate of profits will be materially increased. It may be decided to treat more of the lower-grade material and thus prolong the life of the mine. A good deal of attention has been directed towards the Siberian issues, mainly on account of the further heavy fall in the value of the most active member of the group—Siberian Props. At one time there was a smart rally, repurchases by operators for the fall being induced by a rumour as to a powerful syndicate intending to support the shares, but market men were unable to obtain confirmation of the report, and the price of the shares soon relapsed again. A lengthy circular has been issued by the Directors of the Company with the object of disposing of "certain statements of a misleading and injurious character relating to the Company's affairs." It is officially stated that the Company has not sold its shares in its subsidiaries, the Orsk and Troitzk, but neither the Directors' statement nor the letter issued therewith from "the firm most prominently identified with the Company's inception" definitely denies the allegation that has been made that insiders have unloaded a good many of their shares. Since the issue of the official circular the shares have further slumped, and it will be seen from the table below that they register a heavy loss on the week:—

Evidently age cannot wither nor custom stale the bucket-shop version of the venerable confidence trick. The flats go on tumbling into the same old trap, baited in the same old way, for all the world as if it were a new invention. To qualify yourself as a flat, it is above everything else necessary that you should have the most perfect faith in the goodness of your fellow-men, especially those who bombard you with circulars from offices in the City. All that you have to believe—only this and nothing more—is that the nice, kind gentleman who so eloquently exhorts you to get rich quick is a philanthropist carrying on business for your benefit and the benefit of all and sundry, rather than for his own selfish gain. If this does not make too deep a draft upon your credulity — why then, of course, you take his tip that a particular stock is bound to rise, send him as many pounds as you can afford—probably more—for a deal on his patent marginal deposit system, and when the cover has run off and he clamours for more, you make further remittances, until you come to the end of your resources, or perchance begin to realise that you are being fooled. It often takes people quite a long time to discover that the bucket-shop harpy's game is to predict an advance in stocks that are pretty sure to recede, so that he may annex the deposit without further question, while even if it should turn out that his prediction was correct—such accidents will happen—it does not by any means follow that he will hand over the profit that is supposed to have been made upon a purely imaginary account.

"Martin Bull," 7, Fenchurch-buildings, E.C., is still one of the most active of the practitioners in this line. As a rule, he is successful in putting his customers on to falling stocks, but complaints that have reached me show that the result is sometimes the same if a rise occurs—Bull retains the deposit. Another old acquaintance is John B. McKenzie, 23, Rood-lane, E.C., whose latest effusion—a very long-winded one—is headed, "To my special correspondents." In common with Martin Bull, this rascal is in the habit of addressing his circulars to married women, and in the past few days I have received a number of vigorously worded letters on the subject from husbands who not unnaturally object to this practice. W. Humbert, Nephew, and Co., Wardrobe-chambers, Queen Victoria-street, are again seeking to gull simpletons with a booklet purporting to show "how an investment of £5 may lead to a fortune." This result, improbable in any circumstances, may be regarded as quite an impossibility if the £5 is to be entrusted for "investment" to W. Humbert, Nephew, and Co. A concern using the high-sounding title of "The National Securities' Corporation," 181, Queen Victoria-street, E.C., professes to have lately carried out a "combined stock operation" in Southern Pacifics which resulted in a net profit of £17 10s. on every £5 share. Another operation in "a certain American railroad stock," bound, of course, to be still more successful, is now proposed; yet, instead of keeping this good thing to itself and its old clients, the so-called corporation ("James Lindsay, manager") is now inviting Tom, Dick, and Harry to share in the profits. Tom, Dick, and Harry are obviously regarded as congenital idiots. Ordinarily the bucket-shop keeper makes a pretence at politeness when he is pestering you with circulars. "James Kitson and Co.," 4, Mildmay-chambers, Bishopsgate-street Within, are trying a different tack. "If you are not dealing in stocks and shares," they say, "you might just as well have the courtesy to let us know, so that we may strike your name from our lists." For impudence this will require a lot of beating.

One of the dupes of Freeborn, Franklin, and Co., proprietors of a bucket-shop at Manchester, has sent me a voluminous correspondence narrating his melancholy experiences with that notorious firm. The main facts can be put in a few words. On the "important special recommendation" of the firm, he began a speculation in Home Railway stock by forwarding £5 for "margin." The stock persistently declined, but Freeborn, Franklin, and Co. as persistently urged him to keep it "protected," with the result that in the end he lost about £300, and was thereby ruined. This little story throws a much clearer light on the firm's methods of business than the "A B C Guide to the Stock Exchange," which they advertise so widely in the daily and weekly press.

Yankee Mining Bargains.

The British investor is now being given the precious privilege of acquiring at a discount shares in "The World's Greatest Gold Mine." Needless to say, the mine thus modestly and veraciously described in the prospectus is situated in America. It belongs to a concern called the Bishop Creek Gold Mine Co., of Inyo County, California. With the generosity and unselfishness which, as we all know, characterise the Yankee in matters of business, the promoters are most anxious that some of this wealth should find its way into the pockets of John Bull. A couple of months ago a certain A. Poulter, 30, Eversham House, Victoria Park, London, was peddling the five dollar shares in this Company at half price (10s. 5d.). He quoted a statement by the secretary that the shares were "going to be worth £20 each," and added that the price would be advanced to 12s. 6d. on December 1. Seemingly the price has dropped again, for some one calling himself "The Lombard Association," 45, Lombard-street, E.C., is at present offering the same shares at Poulter's old price of 10s. 5d., though it is now predicted that they will sell "for £60 each." Comment upon such a proposition would surely be superfluous. Why, indeed, should anybody think of paying 10s. 5d. each for shares in the Bishop Creek Gold Mining Co. when—as a circular that is now being distributed intimates—they can get shares in the Monte Cristo Mining and Development Co., of Reno, Nevada, for fifty cents each? It is true that this Company does not boast that its property is "the greatest gold mine in the world," but it affirms that it will be "the greatest wealth producer in the State," which is surely quite good enough. Besides, the Company encloses with its circular a facsimile of a letter from A. Victor Segno, of Los Angeles, California, who professes to have purchased 100,000 shares, and predicts "a big profit." Segno's association with the affair will convey its own moral to readers of TRUTH, in whose Cautionary List he has figured in past years, though he has latterly sunk out of notice. Yet another dazzling proposal is being submitted to the public by A. L. Wisner and Co., 78 and 80, Wall-street, New York. They give their word that you will have "perfect safety and large certain profits" if you will only put your money into the Goldfield Somerset Mining Co. And the one dollar shares are to be had at fifteen cents each—payable by instalments! On the other side of the Atlantic the British investor is evidently regarded as an ass—perhaps not unjustly.

NEW ISSUE.

The following prospectus is published:—

General Investors and Trustees, Limited.—This Company has been formed with a capital of £1,000,000 to conduct the business of a trust and investment company. It has already entered into an agreement to acquire securities and investments spread over twenty-five different undertakings, including railways, electric power and lighting, tramways, and industrials at a cost of £150,000, payable entirely in shares. The capital is divided into 100,000 4½ per cent. Cumulative Preference shares of £5 each and 100,000 Ordinary shares of £5 each. The first issue consists of 60,000 Preference and 60,000 Ordinary shares, of which 20,000 Ordinary shares and 10,000 Preference shares are to be issued and credited as fully paid, in satisfaction of the purchase price of the securities, which, as above-mentioned, have been acquired as a first operation. Subscriptions are now invited for the remainder of this issue.

"TRUTH" LEITER BOX.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

RAILWAYS.

Doune Castle.—The immediate outlook is not very bright, in view of the recent disaster, and under the circumstances I should be inclined to sell. Gama.—What is your object in wanting to call the stocks before there is a profit on the deal? Evidently you do not understand the question of the stock being cum-dividend or ex-dividend; when you exercise the option is a nominal matter, so far as you are concerned, because, should you call the stocks after the dividends have been deducted, the amount of such dividends will be credited to your account. L. S. S.—Your proper course is to sell at once; in fact, you were very ill-advised to have speculated at all. Without knowing further details I am unable to advise upon the last point you raise. Manitoba.—No details have reached this side, but from inquiries I have made the market does not seem to attach much importance to the matter. It is apparently a legal quibble over some alleged infringement by the company of its charter, and does not appear likely to seriously prejudice the position of the stockholders. F. E. P. O.—Were you a regular reader you would have no need to ask my opinion of Trunks. A few weeks ago I went fully into the dividend question, and showed that unless the Board suddenly altered its policy as regards working expenditure for the final month of last year, the dividend upon the Third Preference could hardly be more than 2½ per cent. In any case I regard both Thirds and the Ordinary as promising lock-ups. Guayaquil.—1. An announcement that the January coupon would be paid was made the other day. I do not, however, think the bonds a desirable holding. 2. The stock seems high enough for the present, and unless you are prepared to sit upon it, better sell. 3. See rules.

MINES.

Ignoramus.—1. The scrip is valueless. 2. The undertaking has been absorbed by the Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company. R. M. L.—There is little likelihood of a recovery in the near future to the prices you paid. Robinson Central Deep seem a promising selection. M. C., Canonbury.—I should leave the shares alone. Argyll.—You had better keep your present holdings in hope of some recovery later on. The proposed purchases are fair speculations. Exon.—The Company is likely to need more money to properly develop its property, and I see little attraction in a purchase of the shares. Little Kaffir.—1. A hopeful speculative lock-up. They are £4 shares. 2. You will doubtless have seen the announcement that the dividend has been passed, but you may as well keep the shares for some ultimate recovery. 3. A fair speculation for a moderate profit. 4. Robinson Central Deeps seem a hopeful purchase with a view to dividends. Fife.—Keep all for the present, but on moderate advances it would perhaps be as well to dispose of Nos. 1, 5, and 6. Charlie.—1. There appears little prospect of such a recovery. 2. It is doubtful whether sufficient will be forthcoming to justify a material advance in the price of the shares. 3. Dividend prospects seem remote. Bill Sikes.—They are 10s. shares, fully paid. 2. "The Mining Year Book," or the "Mining Manual." Constant Reader, Plymouth.—You are not entitled to retain the dividend, having sold before the shares have been marked "ex.d." Wondering.—Better secure a moderate profit.

MIXED SECURITIES.

R. J. W.—You could obtain the required yield by spreading the capital over the following:—Central London Railway Preferred, City and South London New Preference, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, Imperial Tobacco Preference, Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway First Preference, Great Western of Brazil Six per Cent. Permanent Debentures, and Bovril Debentures. Ceylon.—The Internal bonds are less marketable than the External issues, but they are good enough to keep. Your requirements in the matter of exchange should be met by dividing the proceeds amongst United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, City and South London New Preference, Antofagasta and Bolivia Five per Cent. Preference, Buenos Ayres and Rosario Seven per Cent. Preference, San Paulo Five per Cent. Preference, Amalgamated Press Preference, and Pears' Preference. Nirvana.—United States Steel Corporation Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds and Pears' Preference would be suitable. Divide the money between the two. Zeno.—If you must sell, I would suggest parting with Nos. 6 and 8. The latter issue will, in any case, be paid off in April. Arctic.—Both well secured investments. No. 2 is not guaranteed by the Municipality but the Board, in the event of any deficiency in its ordinary revenue, possesses power to levy a special rate upon properties valued in the aggregate at £218,000,000. There should consequently be no question about the due payment of the interest. Antelope.—1-4. It would seem best to secure the present prices for these. It is stated with respect to No. 3 that unless developments improve the present rate of profits cannot be long maintained, and a fall in these shares would probably adversely affect No. 4. Hold No. 5. I do not see much likelihood of a material advance in No. 6. Canadian Pacifics should be retained as an investment. See my remarks in this week's issue. K. C. W.—1. You are under a misapprehension. The Simmer East is not one of the companies to be absorbed. 2. Dividend prospects are rather remote. It will be a good time yet before the mine reaches the crushing stage. 3. I have no special information. 4. I would suggest spreading the money over London and South-Western Railway Preferred, Hull and Barnsley Preference, Central London Preferred, Imperial Tobacco Preference, and National Telephone Third Preference. Lex.—1 and 2. The Corporation is doing very well, but in view of the dubious outlook for the market as a whole, I am afraid the shares are likely to go lower. 3. Glencairns appear a fair purchase, but are, of course, speculative. Vancouver.—1. Victoria Station and Pimlico issues are secured upon the joint guarantee of the Brighton, Chatham, and Great Western Railways. The rent, which is to be paid under an agreement running for 999 years (dating from 1858), is sufficient to pay 9 per cent. upon the company's Ordinary, while occasionally an extra ½ per cent. is distributed from its surplus income. You could scarcely obtain a safer investment. 2. Quite possible. Armagh.—1. Hold for the present. 2. Hold Arauco shares as a speculation. There has been an inquiry for them lately in view of the improvement in the company's position. 3. This company is now part of the Pahang Consolidated, and the new shares seem worth holding. 4. The company has been liquidated. 5. I cannot trace this concern. 6. Will make inquiries. 7. Hold these. 8. I have heard nothing recently about this company. 9. These may have some recovery later on. Cardigan.—1. Hold. 2. Such a rise is, in my opinion, doubtful. Discrimination.—1. Hold for a possible recovery and then cut your loss. 2. Recent developments have been very satisfactory, and I see no reason to advise a sale; but the shares are, of course, a speculative holding. 3. Altogether they seem a poor selection. Griff.—I do not see much attraction in 1 and 2, but 3 are a fair speculative purchase. 4 and 5. Humbers would make a promising purchase, especially upon any temporary re-action, and Argylls also are fairly attractive, but the other Motor shares you mention do not appeal to me. Strebor.—1. The matter need not alarm you, seeing that, on the authority of one of the directors, the loss likely to be suffered by the North-Western through the removal is "an infinitesimal drop in the bucket." 2. By exchanging into Colonial Inscribed stocks you could get another ¼ per cent., but that is the utmost you could hope for as a trustee. Cape Threes and Jamaica Threes are two examples of Colonial stock returning 3½ per cent. at present price. H. M.—I would suggest Buenos Ayres Western Railway New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference.

Miscellaneous.

J. T. F., Carrick-on-Suir.—Apply to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, Somerset House, London. Emeritus.—The £10 Ordinary shares are fully paid up and involve no further liability. M. J. G., Dublin.—I do not reply to inquiries by post, nor can I recommend a broker. You can obtain a list of members of the Stock Exchange from the Secretary to the Committee, Stock Exchange, London, E.C. Novice, Tenbury.—The first two firms on the list have been adversely criticised in Truth. I advise you to deal with a member of the Stock Exchange. Novice, Catford.—Have nothing to do with the International Securities Syndicate. If you want to purchase any of the bonds write to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street., E.C. Colonial Investor.—Do not think of embarking in any such system of speculation. It cannot be called an "investment," and as a speculator you would be at a hopeless disadvantage through being in British Guiana. M. M. C., B.N. Borneo.—Melville, Glyn, and Co., like Cunliffe, Russell and Co., charge exorbitant prices for the bonds. L. A. P. R., Burma.—See preceding answer. The other concerns you mention are unknown to me. K. W., Ulverston.—I am afraid you have no means of redress, though only a solicitor could give you a definite opinion. Reader, Peterhead.—No. C. W. D., Bath.—My advice is to deal with a member of the Stock Exchange. A. M. W., Borden Camp.—I know nothing about these obscure companies, but do not take any shares without further inquiries. Timid.—The Charing Cross Bank is a common usury shop. H. B. B.—Providing you are prepared to accept the uncalled liability, I see no harm in advising the exchange. The concern is ably managed, and its prospects are bright. H. C. E., Burgess Hill.—The concern is one that might be profitably avoided. California.—Harrods make a good commercial investment, the Ordinary yielding just under 5 per cent. and the Cumulative Preference about 3⅞ per cent. Collin.—Sell Nos. 1 and 2, and put the proceeds into something more promising. Both have considerable arrears of interest to wipe off. 3. You may be able to get in cheaper by waiting a little. H., Ipswich.—As a high yielding industrial they are not altogether unattractive. Bobi.—The Bank share would make a fair holding, but I think the other might be improved upon. Glory.—It would be best to hold for a further recovery in the near future. Gipsy.—1. Hold for a recovery. 2. Do not fancy the shares. 3. It is now enjoying great prosperity. Limerick.—Hold for a recovery in the near future. Kara Keel.—You sold them before the earthquakes, etc., depressed shares of this kind. In these circumstances I do not think the exchange would prove very profitable, except perhaps for a "long shot." Lavender.—1. It is generally believed that they will experience a recovery in the near future. 2. Daimlers, Darracqs, and Argylls are attractive, especially if you watch the market, but not the other. W. E., Chingford.—1. I cannot trace the concern. 2. Leave it alone. Cuboid.—1. No, the "system" appears to be less attractive than they make out. 2. You could make a selection of Foreign Railway or Government bonds to bring in such a return and afford comparatively good security. 3. Leave it alone. 4. They are not fully paid yet, and are quoted at par—the amount paid up. Not unattractive. Blob.—The bank is thoroughly sound, and the new shares are well worth taking up. Speculator.—1. Do not average. 2. You should get them cheaper by waiting. See this week's comments on Americans. 3. I cannot make rules in order to break them. Lucy.—I cannot advise you as to the bank. For quotations of the shares you mention refer to the daily papers or the Stock Exchange Official List. P. de S.—Thanks for the paper. It seems to be a matter for a solicitor to deal with. Beeston.—I cannot recommend one. Stock Pot.—Your questions are rather too many. Brook Street.—Of course those two are better than the others. Sunlight.—For the sale and purchase of two separate stocks a commission is chargeable on each transaction. For the purchase and sale of the same stock in the same account only one charge is made.

Insurance.

W. J. B.—The Company is perfectly sound, and the policy a very good one, but before taking it I should ask the Norwich Union Life Office to quote you for a similar policy. For an almost identical contract, but for a different age, I recently found the Norwich better than the office you mention. I doubt if the bonus would be so good as you mention. E. M. R.—I shall be writing on this subject very soon, and shall quote some of your remarks, which are very much to the point, though I do not wholly agree with all you say. Nogard.—1. Scottish Amicable Minimum Premium Policy. 2. Norwich Union. 3. The company no longer issue the exact policy I referred to, but have something similar. The Norwich Union Life Office would quote you for the exact thing. W. D. S.—The Royal Exchange and the Ocean are both first-class companies. I would call your attention to the fact that the prospectus you send deals only with compensation in the event of accident, whereas you refer to the health of your servants. The insurance of compensation in the event of illness is rather expensive, except in regard to certain specific diseases, which neither occur often nor last long.

Industrials Inactive—Pekin Meeting—Insurance Shares in Request—Textiles Dull—Spurt in Lyons—Breweries Depressed.

Apart from two or three sporadic movements of no great importance, the condition of the Industrial market has been cheerless and inert. The anticipations of a quickening of interest and expansion of business founded upon the prosperous state of the country's trade and the recent reduction in the Bank rate still remain unfulfilled, and though everyone hopes that a turn for the better is coming very soon the most optimistic can scarcely say that it is yet in sight. The easier terms on which the carry-over was effected did little or nothing to brighten the situation, and the week closed without any appreciable improvement. The meeting of the Pekin Syndicate naturally attracted much attention, in view of the attacks that have been made upon the directors. While admitting that the past year had been full of disappointment, Mr. Carl Meyer warmly denied that the Board could have foreseen or prevented the difficulties that had occurred. Mr. Luzzatti, who secured the original concessions from the Chinese Government, repeated his criticisms of what he characterised as the amazing and deplorable policy of the directors in seeking first to work the Honan concession instead of setting about the exploitation of the infinitely more valuable coal and iron field which they possessed in the province of Shansi. However, the shareholders as a body showed no disposition to endorse the demand for a thorough-going change in the management, which had been advanced in some quarters, Mr. Meyer's intimation that it was intended to strengthen the Board by one or two new appointments being apparently accepted as satisfactory. There has been some talk of a working agreement between the Pekin Syndicate and the Chinese Engineering and Mining Company, which has met with more success, but the idea is not yet regarded seriously. Some noteworthy movements have been witnessed in insurance shares, owing to the rumours of amalgamations which have been discussed lately in my insurance notes. Commercial Union rose 3 to 79-81, and it has now been announced that the Company has entered into a provisional agreement to acquire the business of the Scottish County and Mercantile Insurance Company. A similar rise, based upon another amalgamation report, was recorded in London Assurance shares, which, however, have since receded. The Law Guarantee and Trust Society, which was established in 1888 and has long been recognised as a very strong and successful office, has hitherto confined its business to what might almost be called financial insurance. Hitherto, however, it has not transacted employers' liability, personal accident, burglary, motor-car, third party, plate glass, and other forms of insurance usually undertaken by accident offices. These classes of business have been done by the United Legal Indemnity Insurance Society, which was founded three or four years ago, and has built up a substantial premium income, as well as a large agency organisation. The United Legal was somewhat at a disadvantage on account of the relatively small amount of its share capital, and its business has now been acquired by the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, which guarantees all the policies of the United Legal. These policies are quite modern and very attractive, and this association with the Law Guarantee provides the most abundant security for the fulfilment of all contracts. In Textiles not much business has been done, but prices generally are a trifle higher. Here is a little table showing the yields of some securities of this description calculated on the prices at the settlement last week:—

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

	Price		Yield per Cent.
Coats Ordinary	6¾—¾	.....	£3 12 8
Calico Printers Debentures	96 —8	.....	4 1 8
Fine Cotton, Cum. Pref.	22/—23/-	.....	4 6 11
" " Ord.	33/6 - 34/6	.....	4 13 1
Bradford Dyers	25/—26/-	.....	5 6 8

An interesting feature of the week has been a lively spurt in J. Lyons' Ordinary shares, which I have often recommended as a good commercial investment. It is whispered that some new and promising developments on the part of this enterprising concern will be announced in the course of the next few weeks. Whether that be the case or not, the Company is undoubtedly doing well, and, considering the excellent dividends that it has paid for some years past—the last was 32½ per cent.—the shares are a desirable purchase at the present quotation of 5 15-16. Brewery Company shares as a rule have exhibited a slight fall, and there is evidently a feeling abroad that any increase of profits which the industry may show will possibly be wiped out by the effect of fresh legislation or additional taxation. To those who are inclined to regard Debenture investments in breweries with more favour than Ordinary shares, the following table may be useful. It gives the approximate yield of the stock at the current prices:—

	Price.		Yield per Cent.
Bass 4½ p.c. M. Deb. Stock	109½	.....	£4 2 7
Worthington's 4½ p.c. M. Deb. Stock red.	110	.....	4 6 7
Whitbread's 4 p.c. Deb. Stock red.	93	.....	4 7 0
J. W. Cameron & Co. 4½ p.c. 1st M. Deb. Stock	92½	.....	4 12 5
Hall's Oxford Brewery 4 p.c. 1st M. Deb. Stock red.	85	.....	4 14 8
Watney Combe's 3½ p.c. Perp. 1st Deb. Stock	71½	.....	4 19 3
Huggins & Co. 3½ p.c. 1st M. Irred. Deb. Stock	62½	.....	5 14 3
Bullard & Sons 4 p.c. M. Deb. Stock	67	.....	6 1 3

A revival of activity has been manifested in Motor shares, and in particular Darracqs and Daimlers have both advanced. The National Telephone Company's Deferred stock rose 1½ to 112 on a declaration of a dividend of 5½ per cent. This is the highest rate that has been paid, but, having regard to the conditions upon which the undertaking is to be transferred to the Government in four years' time, the present price of the stock seems to be quite high enough. At the annual meeting of the National Provincial Bank of England, Mr. Robert Wigram, the Chairman, was able to give a very satisfactory account of its position. The cash at the Bank of England and at the head offices and branches, as well as at call and at short notice, showed an increase of £637,000 over the previous year, and these items, with the investments, give a total of £27,604,353, or 51 per cent. of the bank's liabilities to the public. The bills discounted, loans, etc., showed an increase of £1,643,000. The reserve fund, which had never once been drawn upon, had been increased to £2,350,000.

QUEER STORY.

LINDA'S VALENTINE.

IT is curious to note how entirely Valentine's Day—the festival once so dear to, and so religiously observed by, amorous youths and maidens—has gone out of fashion. I can recall the time when it rivalled Christmas Day itself as an occasion for sending presents and missives, and when the Post Office had to put on extra hands to deal with the mails. But now—well, I doubt whether if, when February 14 dawns, the average individual realises that it is Valentine's Day at all—unless you specially call his attention to it, and then perhaps he may go so far as to say:—

"Valentine's Day! Great Scot, so it is!"

But that is all the recognition it gets from him; the next moment he has forgotten it as completely as though it had never existed. Truly, O Saint's Day sacred to sweethearts, thou art fallen on evil times!

I wonder why this is. Are youths less amorous and maidens less sentimental than of yore? Have the keener demands of business on the one hand, and of golf and hockey on the other, become so absorbing as to leave neither thought nor leisure for this sweet trifling? Let that be for students of such matters to determine; enough for me to record the fact, and at the same time to apologise for telling you a story that deals with so obsolete a theme—a story that happened within my own experience more than forty years ago.

The morning of February 14, 186— arrived, and with it a small parcel, by registered post, for Linda Eglinton.

Her father, a despotic and somewhat suspicious old gentleman, with whom she was breakfasting tête-à-tête, fixed his keen, inquisitorial eyes upon the girl as she opened it. There was a certain confusion in her manner that did not escape him, and that made him watch her all the more intently while her trembling fingers slowly untied the string and undid the paper. At length she arrived at the contents, and her face grew more flushed and her manner more and more confused. It was then that Simon Eglinton spoke.

"What's that, Linda?" he inquired, sharply.

"It's a—a—a—ring," stammered the girl, in a faint voice.

"A ring?" he exclaimed, frowning. "Let me see it."

Linda, looking almost terrified, handed him the article in question—a pretty little thing of the gipsy pattern, set with small emeralds and brilliants.

Simon Eglinton, being in wholesale jewellery himself, knew good stones when he saw them, and he knew that these were good stones, small though they were, and that they had not been bought retail a penny under £50. He scowled angrily; not because the stones were valuable, but because his paternal sense was deeply outraged by the discovery that his daughter possessed, unknown to him, some admirer who had presumed to send her so costly a present.

"Who has sent you this?" he demanded, sternly.

"I—I—don't know, daddy," faltered Linda.

He sniffed somewhat incredulously.

"Give me the cover, if you please," he said, in his curtest manner.

With trembling hand the girl obeyed. Her father first turned out the inside of the package, to make sure there was no letter enclosed. Then, adjusting his gold-rimmed glasses on his Roman nose, he carefully scrutinised the handwriting of the address.

"Umph! You say you don't know whom this comes from, Linda?" he said, after an impressive pause.

"No, daddy; truly, I don't," cried his daughter, with the tears in her pretty eyes.

"Umph!" he grunted. "Well, you have never deceived me yet, Linda; and" (a little grudgingly) "I will take your word now. But—umph! Ah! The writing is transparently in a disguised hand—and yet it seems somehow half familiar. It looks like—— But no, it cannot be—and yet, 'pon my soul, I do believe it is. Tell me, girl" (with a keen, suspicious look), "you haven't been—I mean, you haven't entered into any secret understanding with young Carlton, have you?"

Linda's face flushed a deeper crimson than ever, with mingled confusion and distress.

"Oh, no, daddy—truly—upon my honour," she cried, emphatically.

"Since you say so, I believe you," replied her father, who could see that she was speaking the truth. "All the same, I could swear—yes, I could swear that this is young Carlton's writing, clumsily disguised. In fact, I am certain of it."

"Oh, daddy!"

And again that look of confusion and distress.

"If it is he who has sent you this ring—as I am sure it is," went on her father, frowning, "he has taken a most unwarrantable liberty—behaved in a most improper and ungentlemanly way. And I shall take an early opportunity of telling him so."

"Oh, daddy! Please—please don't do that!"

Linda's tones were positively imploring. Her father regarded her with evidently reawakened suspicion.

"Why not?" he demanded, coldly. "Why should you wish to prevent me from reprimanding him for his impertinence?"

"It would—would—make things so—so—uncomfortable," faltered Linda, in great distress. "I should—should—be ashamed of ever meeting Mr. Carlton again, if you spoke to him on such a subject."

"Nonsense, girl," replied her father, impatiently. "It is he, not you, who would have reason, and good reason, to be ashamed of himself. It is due to you, and to your family, that he should be told that you resent the liberty he has taken; and I shall certainly make a point of acquainting him with that fact on the earliest possible opportunity."

"But—but—supposing it is not he who has sent me the ring, after all?" suggested Linda, desperately.

"In that case, my speaking to him will have the salutary effect of clearing up an unfortunate misunderstanding, and of relieving the young man's character from a disagreeable slur," replied Simon Eglinton, in his pompous way.

"But—but—daddy, think of me!"

"I am thinking of you," replied her father. "That is why I am resolved to find out the impertinent puppy who has paid you this underhand and compromising attention. If it is not young Carlton—though I am confident it is he—it must be some other fellow; and Carlton's repudiation—if he can repudiate it to my satisfaction—is the first necessary step towards clearing the ground for further investigation. Indeed, I cannot conceive how, as a right-minded girl, you can possibly object to my taking up the cudgels in your behalf; unless," he added, again regarding her flushed face suspiciously, "you yourself have some private understanding with the sender of the ring——"

"Oh, no, daddy. I give you my word I haven't."

"Well, then, Linda, let me hear no further foolish objections. I know what my duty is, as your father and natural protector, and I mean to do it," he replied, coldly, as he thrust the ring and package into his pocket and rose and left the room.

Linda, looking very distressed and unhappy, ran upstairs to her mother—a delicate invalid—who always breakfasted in bed, and told her just what had happened.

"Oh, mammie, do—do please try and stop the pater speaking to Mr. Carlton about it," she implored. "I shall die of shame if he does."

"But why, my dear?" said her mother, gently. "You have done nothing to be ashamed of; and it was certainly very wrong of Mr. Carlton to send you a valuable ring in that stealthy sort of way. He ought to be told that his conduct is resented. I can't help agreeing with your father in that."

"Yes, mammie, but—but—— Well, you know what Mr. Carlton is—so—so—retiring and diffident. If it was he who sent the ring, it wouldn't have been from any—any—unworthy motive, but—but—because he—he—wanted to—to—feel his way, and—and—— I can't explain more than that, mammie. But surely you understand."

And Linda hid her crimson face upon her mother's shoulder.

"My dear," said the other, putting her arm round her daughter affectionately, "I think I do understand now. You care for Mr. Carlton, Linda?"

Linda, her face still hidden, faltered a smothered affirmative.

"Oh, mammie, now you know, please—please stop the pater speaking to Mr. Carlton!" she added, entreatingly.

"My dear," replied her mother, at once very sympathetic and very helpless, "I would stop your father if I could. But how can I? You know what he is when he makes up his mind to a thing. Nothing on earth will turn him aside, and if I were to attempt interference, the only result would be to provoke him into an even worse humour with Mr. Carlton than he is already, so that I should be making the case worse instead of better." And the poor lady shrugged her shoulders in a gesture of pathetic impotence.

Linda, knowing her father well, was unable to dispute the force of her mother's words. He could be affectionate, and even indulgent, to his womenfolk, when he liked; but he insisted on being their absolute autocrat, and when he put down his foot there was no gainsaying him. The distressed and unhappy girl, therefore, saw nothing for it but to accept the situation.

In the meanwhile, Simon Eglinton, very pompous, solemn, and important, was on his way to the residence of young Mr. Geoffrey Carlton, which stood about a mile distant. He felt sure he should find the young man at home, for the latter was of independent means, and had no business engagements to take him out early in the morning. And on this point Simon Eglinton's anticipations proved correct.

"Yes, sir," said the butler, in answer to his inquiry, "Mr. Carlton is in. I think he has just finished breakfast. Will you step this way, sir?"

The butler showed him into the library, then went off to fetch his master, who presently made his appearance. He was a good-looking young fellow, though his face was rather spoiled by a certain want of character about it, and by an air of undue timidity and shyness evident both in his expression and his manner.

"Good morning, Mr. Eglinton," he stammered, in his quick, nervous way. "Very—very pleased to see you. W-what can I do for you? P-pray be s-seated."

"Thank you; I prefer to stand," replied Simon, very stiff and solemn. "The fact is, Mr. Carlton" (producing the package containing the ring from his coat pocket), "I have something not very pleasant to say to you."

"To me?" murmured young Carlton, looking, as no doubt he felt, exceedingly nervous and alarmed.

"Yes, to you," pursued the outraged father, sternly. "Have the goodness to look at this ring and this package addressed to my daughter in your handwriting, sir, and then to explain to me what you mean by it."

Young Carlton stared bewildered, almost petrified, at the ring and the package.

"I—I—don't understand you, Mr. Eglinton," he faltered nervously. "I n-never s-sent your daughter a ring. I sh-shouldn't think of doing anything so confoundedly impertinent."

"What! This is not your handwriting?" demanded the other, sternly, holding out the label to him.

"I'll—I'll—swear it—it—isn't," cried young Carlton.

Simon Eglinton fixed him with a searching gaze.

"You assure me of that, upon your honour as a gentleman?" he said.

"Upon my honour as a g-gentleman," was the emphatic rejoinder.

Linda's father found himself not a little taken aback. Young Carlton's repudiation was so evidently and palpably genuine, that, in spite of the remarkable resemblance in the handwriting, Eglinton could not but accept it. His manner changed and became friendly and apologetic.

"I am very glad to hear you say that," he remarked. "I can only assure you that, under the circumstances, I am sorry I spoke. At the same time, you will admit that the handwriting on this label is extraordinarily like yours, and that I had some reasonable justification for being misled by it."

Young Carlton looked at the label carefully, and admitted the writing to be such that it might naturally be taken for his own.

"It—it l-looks very much as if some one had p-purposely tried to imitate my hand," he said.

"But why should any one wish to do that?" inquired Simon Eglinton, with a perplexed frown.

"I c-can't think, unless it was a st-stupid practical joke," answered young Carlton.

"But people don't go to the expense of buying fifty-guinea rings to play practical jokes with," said the other. "It seems to me more probable that my daughter, unknown to herself, must have attracted the attention of some impertinent admirer, whose handwriting happens, by a curious coincidence, to resemble yours; and if my supposition is correct, I shall make a point of finding out who the fellow is, and giving him back his ring and a bit of my mind with it."

"Serve the b-bounder right for his c-confounded impudence," ejaculated Geoffrey Carlton with venom quite unexpected in so mild-looking a young man.

"But I say," he added, with nervous impulsiveness, after a moment's pause, "you—you—d-don't think your daughter c-cares for any other—for any fellow, do you, Mr. Eglinton?"

"Not that I am aware of," answered Simon, naturally rather surprised by the question. "Linda has never given me any reason to suppose so."

"Because," continued young Carlton, who, having broken the ice, now let himself go with impulsive and reckless unrestraint, as shy men will, "I—I—had half hoped, don't you know, that perhaps she m-might m-manage to—to—c-care for me a l-little, don't you know; and I—I've t-tried to make up my mind scores of t-times to ask your p-permission to pay my addresses to her, only I couldn't f-find c-courage; and—and—d-dash it all, Mr. Eglinton, s-should you have any—any—objection to my speaking to her?"

"My dear fellow," replied Mr. Eglinton, evidently quite unprepared for this unexpected turn of events, "you take me completely by surprise. I had no idea you cared for Linda. I—umph!—well, no! I've no objection to your speaking to her. But I must warn you that I shall not attempt to influence her one way or the other. Let that be plainly understood."

"Of course n-not. I sh-shouldn't w-wish you to do s-such a thing. But I say, M-Mr. Eglinton," cried young Carlton, with all the hasty impetuosity of a nervous man who has once broken through the barrier of the shyness that has long restrained him, and who can no longer control his eagerness to rush full-speed to the goal, "I s-say, w-when w-will it be convenient for me to s-speak to Miss Eglinton?"

Simon Eglinton could scarcely help smiling at such amorous haste.

"Really, I must leave that to you," he replied. "To-morrow—the next day—the day after. You must choose your own time and opportunity. It is a matter in which I shall not attempt to interfere."

"Then I think I'll run r-round this—this—m-morning," said young Carlton.

* * * * *

"My dear," remarked Mrs. Eglinton to her spouse, a few days after the engagement was announced, "I can't think who it was who sent Linda that ring on Valentine's Day. But whoever it was, he would feel rather sick if he knew that it has simply been the occasion of bringing about her engagement to another man."

Simon Eglinton smiled, and pinched his wife's ear—an unusual effort of playfulness for so solemn a gentleman.

"My dear, he does know," was his reply, "and he does not feel at all sick. On the contrary, he feels immensely pleased with himself. Young Carlton merely wanted an opportunity and a stimulus, and the ring was sent to Linda on purpose to provide them."

"Simon, what do you mean?" cried his wife, quickly.

"Mean? Why, that I sent the ring myself, of course," chuckled the wholesale jeweller.

ART NOTES.

POSTMEN ARTISTS AND OTHERS.

A VERY good way of making the best of two worlds is to follow two professions—the more widely distinguished the better—at the same time, as, for instance, those of postman and artist. Not only are you likely to attract more of the public attention—which is, after all, the breath of life nowadays—as both than you are as either, but your work is always sure of some meed of appreciation. Thus, if people complain that you are a bad postman, you can always counter with the plea that you are a good artist, and vice versa. Further, as those who are qualified to criticise your postal performance are unlikely to have any very intimate knowledge of art—or qualified art critics to know much about the workings of the Post Office—your position is a fairly safe one. All of which accounts, I suppose, for the fact that within the last few years we have had quite a crop of "policeman artists," and "commercial traveller artists," and "postman artists," and the like. The whole movement provides, incidentally, a very pretty study in evolution, which has been going on ever since the artist was first admitted to rank among the respectable classes. In the good old times when a policeman was very much superior, socially speaking, to a painter, there would have been no purpose—unless it were humility—in thus double-barrelling his profession. But little by little the artist has risen until he is now permitted to adorn the dinner-tables of the first families, while postmen and policemen must still remain upon the pavement outside. As soon as Art became respectable every one wanted to be called an artist. Thus came about the first evolutionary stage—when the tailor called himself a "sartorial artist," and the cook a "culinary artist," and the postman, I suppose, a "mercurial artist," and so forth. In some trades and professions this stage is not yet passed. You may see the photographer, for instance, fiercely protesting at this very moment, with the powerful backing of Mr. Bernard Shaw, that he is an artist—and the most elevated kind of artist at that—and that any one who does not consider him an artist is no gentleman. But most of them have realised by this time that it is not much good calling yourself an artist if you cannot get anyone else to believe it, and that the only way to impress upon the public that you are actually an artist is to become a painter—which is not always the same thing indeed, though, fortunately, the public does not know it. So now we are vouchsafed the works of Mr. Samuel Hancock, whose paintings are being shown at the Doré Gallery, and whose chief claim to fame—or so the organisers of the exhibition would have us believe—is that he has for the last fifteen years been a City postman at the East Central Office. No one will deny that such is a very meritorious record, and that Mr. Hancock has deserved well of his country and of the East Central District; but it is not so easy to understand what it has to do with his ability as a painter. Let me say at once that I find his work agreeably disappointing—that it shows, quite contrary to expectation, considerable artistic feeling and some ability in execution. But such being the case, it seems all the harder upon Mr. Hancock to proclaim, urbi et orbi, that we must not expect too much from him, because he is not really an artist at all, but only a postman who paints in his leisure hours. It may certainly attract a few more people to visit the galleries than would otherwise be the case; it may obtain rather lengthier notices in the press (this, by the way, is one of them, for I do not suppose I should have written anything about it had I not been told that the artist was not an artist at all, but a postman), and thus gain some extra gratuitous advertisement; it may even result in the sale of some pictures which might otherwise have lacked purchasers. But, granted all this, it is yet doing Mr. Hancock a number of possible ill-turns. To say nothing of the indignity of being thus publicly classed as a sort of artistic freak and as deserving of the most charitable criticism only, it is more than likely to injure him in the future, both from the artistic and the worldly point of view. Supposing that, misled by his press notices, and by the sale of some of his pictures, he should decide to abandon the safe profession of postman for the hazardous calling of painter. Not only would he be deserting the substance for the shadow, he would be laying up for himself the certainty of disappointment. He would be stepping down from his well-advertised pedestal into the ruck of ordinary artists. Did he exhibit his pictures, they would be criticised only as the work of a painter, not as those of a postman any longer. Unkind things would very likely be said of them which they now escape; those who are ready enough to buy the paintings of an artistic postman would never think of spending their money on the work of a possibly mediocre painter. On the other hand, even did he decide not to take the fatal plunge, he might very probably become a dissatisfied man, scorning the humble profession he now adorns, longing always for that which he might adorn. It would have been kinder, in exhibiting Mr. Hancock's pictures, to withhold all mention of his more serious calling, and let them take their chance as works of art, pure and simple. Painting is an excellent hobby for postmen and others, but when it leads to public exhibition it is apt to become a danger.

Mr. Hancock might learn a useful lesson or two from another more or less amateur exhibition of drawings now being held at the Graves Galleries. It is by Sir Richard Sankey, and it consists of pictorial reminiscences of his travels. Sir Richard is a K.C.B., and the letters R.E. adorn his name, personal details which I should not mention were it not that I wish to bring them to the notice of Mr. Hancock. From them he may surmise—as I do—that Sir Richard has already gained honourable distinction in other than the artistic walk of life; that he has found painting an agreeable hobby which serves to recall pleasant incidents of his active career, and that—and this is the most important point of all—he can afford to exhibit the fruits of his hobby for his own satisfaction and that of his friends without very much caring whether he sells any of them or what any one else thinks about them. His position in life (Mr. Hancock and I may take it) is secured—he has no thoughts of relinquishing his profession and risking his future prospects; he has the K.C.B., and does not accordingly aspire to change R.E. into R.A. When Mr. Hancock has attained—as I am sure I hope he will attain—to the highest possible position in the Post Office hierarchy; when he has several letters to put after his own name instead of into other people's letter-boxes; when he can afford to consider his worldly position assured—then, and then only, will it be safe for him to seek the laurels, whatever they are, of one whose pictures are exhibited in public galleries. Until then I would in all seriousness beg him to ponder on the sentence, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," which may be freely translated, for this occasion only: "I mistrust the advice of those friends and critics who advise me to attempt sitting on two stools at once."

MUSIC.

"FIDELIO" AT COVENT GARDEN.

THE revival of "Fidelio" at Covent Garden last week was an interesting event, though it is unfortunately not possible to say that the performance was all that might have been desired. Certain well-meaning folk have recently been attempting to convince the world that those who criticise German singing are the victims of hallucination, and that in reality the vocalists who come to us from the Fatherland are of unsurpassable excellence. Last week's performance must surely have convinced anyone taking this view of his error. Anything more deplorable than some of the singing heard in the course of the evening it would be difficult to imagine. Little purpose would be served by mentioning names, since one and all of the artists concerned were manifestly doing the best of which they were capable. But the fact itself there was no possibility of overlooking, and it is proper to point it out in the hope that in some way or other means may be found eventually of bringing about a more satisfactory state of affairs in this all-important respect. At present, it must be confessed, the pleasures of such a season of German opera as that now in progress at Covent Garden are sadly qualified by the shortcomings of German singing.

Nor was this the end of the matter, either, in the case of this particular performance. For some inscrutable reason the management brought over the eminent Belgian violinist, M. Ysaye, to conduct the work, with anything but happy results. Perhaps the best comment on the situation was that of a well-known musician, who was asked between the acts what he thought of Ysaye conducting. "I think he plays Beethoven's violin concerto divinely" was his discreet and seemingly irrelevant but actually most apt reply. M. Ysaye is, no doubt, a sound enough conductor in the ordinary way, but with the direction of opera he is unfamiliar. It has been stated, indeed, that this was actually the first time that he had ever conducted a performance of "Fidelio," and having had the privilege of hearing the performance in question, I have not the least difficulty in crediting the statement. Perhaps there has been exaggeration on the subject here and there. Ysaye may well have been puzzled, indeed, to reconcile the conflicting assertions of some of his critics. According to this one he was too rigid, according to another too flabby. One thought that the players went to pieces under him, another that he ruled them with a rod of iron. All are agreed, however, that it was not a satisfactory performance which he obtained.

Yet any performance of "Fidelio" was better than none. There is no need to exaggerate on the subject. One critic, I notice, talks of the work as "Beethoven's charming opera," which is surely the least appropriate epithet in the language to bestow upon "Fidelio." Next to its fine music the most notable feature of "Fidelio" is, perhaps, the uncheerful character of its book. "Inspissated gloom" is all too mild a term to define its general atmosphere. All's well that ends well, and wifely devotion is duly rewarded in the last act, but how harrowing is what has gone before. Really one can hardly wonder that so many attempts were needful to induce the public to accept the work, even with Beethoven's name attached. Yet from the purely musical point of view, how much there is to admire. If its book is gloomy and the form of the opera old-fashioned according to our present-day notions, the beauty, power, and the sublimity of its music will preserve the work, it is safe to assert, so long as music lasts. Beethoven himself once referred jocularly to "Fidelio" as an ancient ruin; but it is likely to outlive yet many a glittering structure of more recent date built upon the sands of passing popularity.

A debatable point always raised in connection with "Fidelio" is as to the best means of introducing the great "Leonora No. 3" overture—though to put it thus is perhaps rather a begging of the question, since not a few eminent authorities, including Dr. Richter and Herr Mottl, take the view that it should not be introduced at all, but be reserved exclusively for the concert room. Last week it was played between the acts, and this is the course usually adopted in German opera houses, though in some cases the practice is, I believe, to play it between the scenes of the second act, on the principle that it comes more rightly with its joyous ending after Florestan has been saved and his release is assured. Von Bülow, pushing the same principle even further, played it sometimes as an epilogue to the whole work, while Richard Strauss once played it, in addition to the ordinary overture in C, at the beginning. None of these arrangements can, however, be regarded as satisfactory, the mistake being to suppose that it need be introduced at all. It may not be generally known, by the way, that when the work was brought out in its revised form at Vienna in 1814, the overture used by Beethoven was that of "The Ruins of Athens"!—a little fact which may be commended to the notice of some of our latter-day pedants and purists.

Announcement has been made of the extension of the German opera season for another fortnight. Better proof could hardly be desired of the success which has attended the undertaking. The interesting report is also current that it is proposed to revive "Die Zauberflöte," a work which has not been heard in London since goodness knows how long, before the season ends, while the appearance is promised of at least one interesting new singer, who is also an old one, and one very favourably known to Covent Garden audiences, in the person of Mr. Bispham. As regards recent performances, the revival of "Fidelio" I have referred to already. On Saturday an interesting event was the début of Mme. Agnes Nicholls as Elsa, a part which, it is said, had never before been played in German at Covent Garden by an English-speaking artist. Mme. Nicholls' triumph was great, and warranted hopes of many such by other native-born singers which the future may bring forth.

Many good concerts have been given lately. At the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert on Saturday there were, as usual, an excellent programme and a large audience. The former has long been the rule at these concerts, but not invariably the latter, and it is eminently satisfactory to mark the steady improvement which has been witnessed of recent years in this respect. A feature of Saturday's programme was Herr von Dohnanyi's new concertstück for 'cello and orchestra, of which report had said great things. In the result, however, it proved something of a disappointment. The work is well written, and contains some pleasant pages, but it is far too long, more than a trifle reminiscent at times, and generally undistinguished. Mr. Wood's superb performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was much more acceptable. On the same afternoon at the Bechstein Hall M. Léon Sametini and Miss Leonora Sparkes had a good audience, who appreciated both the violin playing of the one and the brilliant singing of the other.

Earlier in the week Miss Marie Hall took farewell of her London admirers preparatory to her departure on a long tour in America and Australia, and played as brilliantly as ever in a programme which was almost too good to be popular. The début of Miss Marie Stuart, the "coming Clara Butt," as her friends describe her, was another feature of this concert. Miss Stuart, whose stature is startling, has a fine, rich contralto voice, but her singing rather lacks spontaneity and temperament at present. No doubt, however, she will make more of her powers in due course.

Mr. Harold Bauer's pianoforte recital on Friday was gratefully distinguished by the unhackneyed character of his programme. Among other unfamiliar things which he introduced was a fine "Prélude, Fugue, et Variations," by César Franck, originally written, it appears, for organ solo, and also arranged for piano and harmonium, which has been cleverly adapted for piano solo purposes by Mr. Bauer, who played the work beautifully. Schumann's F sharp minor sonata he gave also particularly well, along with various smaller pieces. Another pianist who has been winning favourable opinions is Miss Alma Stenzel, a young American artist, whose technical equipment is considerable. A word of praise is due also to Herr Gottfried Galston in respect of his finished playing at his recent Chopin recital.

In the way of chamber music the Rosé Quartet from Vienna were heard at the Broadwood concert on Thursday, when they won golden opinions again by the perfection of their ensemble and the distinction of their style, though I cannot agree with one critic that their tone is particularly luscious. They were heard this time in Beethoven's posthumous quartet in E flat major and that of Schubert in A minor, and if the Schubert seemed to go the better of the two, perhaps the music had as much to do with this as the playing. It is heresy, of course, to breathe a word at this time of the day against Beethoven's posthumous quartets, or even to hint at such a thing as tedium in their connection. But if the two quartets in question were by totally unknown composers, how many would elect to hear Beethoven's work in preference to Schubert's?

On Monday an interesting performance was that of Bossi's "Paradise Lost" by the London Choral Society. The work is hardly likely to live, but it contains some effective music, and Mr. Fagge and his supporters showed enterprise in giving Londoners a chance of hearing it.

British music lovers will read with interest and gratification of the graceful terms in which M. Messager has been expressing himself to a Parisian interviewer concerning the standard of musical culture in this country. "I do not pretend," he is reported as saying, "that London has a larger number of musical experts than, say, Paris or Berlin; but I do say that Londoners love music more whole-heartedly than either Parisians or Berliners." That statement will surprise many as coming from M. Messager, but more startling still is M. Messager's statement that "Parisians do not go to the opera or to concerts nearly as much as Londoners." If these views are bold, however, what will some of M. Messager's Parisian readers say to the following:—

"The one thing that is wanted here is the chorus material. Unfortunately, the ladies of the chorus in France are not of the same quality as those we get in London. There they are intelligent, fairly educated ladies. Here——" M. Messager threw out his hands expressively and shook his head.

It has been suggested that M. Messager's pro-British sympathies may lead eventually to the hearing of an English opera in Paris. Who knows? Stranger things have happened.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie was hardly less entertaining on Debussy and his impressionist congeners than on Strauss and Reger. While readily admitting, he said, the bewildering ingenuity of their harmonic twistings, and sometimes ear-torturing progressions, as well as crediting them with having developed a system of composition utterly unlike any other, the outcome of it all, as a whole, left one unsatisfied and empty as Shacabac after Barmecide's feast—as if one had been listening not to music but to its mere shadowy spook. Sir Alexander went on to make a sound point in the observation that, whatever else might be thought of music of this order, it was curiously different from that which had hitherto been associated with the national characteristics of the French—to wit, lucidity, grace, and charm. Perhaps it is one of the results of that increasing intercommunication which, according to some, is rapidly obliterating all national traits and reducing the members of every nation to one common type. If so, this may go further to explain the fact that we, in our turn, have seemed of late to be acquiring characteristics in our music—as for example, a partiality for the morbid and the melancholy—hitherto never associated with what Emerson would have classed among our sturdy British traits.

Mr. Richard Temple, so well known to the theatrical public as an old Savoyard, has been appointed director of the dramatic class and professor of elocution and diction at the Royal Academy of Music. Till recently Mr. Temple had been associated, if I am not mistaken, in a similar capacity with the rival institution at South Kensington.

Who says that we have no English conductors—or only one? Mr. H. J. Wood has clearly a rival to be reckoned with in Lieut.-Colonel Mitchell, one of General Booth's musical lieutenants, who has been dubbed the "Salvation Army Sousa." According to an admirer, who was present at the Salvationist brass band festival recently held at Clapton, he is a master of his art, with engaging mannerisms all his own. Colonel Mitchell would seem, in short, to be giving up to the Salvation Army what was meant for—Queen's Hall.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Among the many variants—Young's, Voltaire's, Goldsmith's, etc.—of the epigram, "Speech was given to conceal thought," the witty Bishop South's is, perhaps, the smartest and most cynical: "Speech was given to the ordinary sort of men whereby to communicate their mind; but to wise men whereby to conceal it." Now, what the witty bishop said sarcastically of speech, most modern poets, and some precious prose writers, seem seriously to hold of style—that its very unintelligibility is a note of genius. But in the poet's case, and even in that of the precious prose writer, the nut of the style, however hard, is worth the cracking for the sake of the kernel of the thought it contains; but in a book of gossip, even when the gossip is about such interesting or exalted folk as Mr. Escott recalls in "Society in the Country House" (1), you are irritated at having to read twice over passages to discover their far from momentous meanings. Again and again you have to wrestle with the meanings of such passages as this:—

The most impressive of Lady Rolle's Whig guests, Henry Reeve, editor of the Edinburgh, seems to have anticipated a retributive blight on the Rolle arboretum and gardens. He was constrained to admit that the desertion of plain Whig principles, notwithstanding the perfection of foliage and growth secured by Lord Rolle for Tory Bicton, must have marked an advance upon its outdoor beauties before it became one of Pitt's social strongholds.

Apropos of Pitt, by the way, this happy epigram, quoted from Moore by Mr. Escott, re the restrictions suggested to be imposed upon the Prince Regent during the lunacy of his father, may be new to you:—

A strait waistcoat on him and restrictions on me,
A more limited monarchy could not well be.

Of George III. as a child the following truly Georgian anecdote is told: While George III.'s mother, the Princess of Wales, was dejectedly watching him and his brother, the Duke of York, at their lessons, she heard the younger say to the elder:—

"When we are grown up you may have a wife, but I shall keep a mistress." "Be quiet; there must be no mistresses at all," replied the future king. "Learn your pronouns," interposed their widowed mother. "Can either of you tell me what a pronoun is?" "A pronoun," replied the Duke of York, "is to a noun what a mistress is to a wife—a substitute and representative."

It is curious to find a practical joke, of which that facetious bishop, South, was the occasion, attributed by Abraham Hayward's sister to her own uncle on his promotion by Lord North. In the original story a curate preached before his bishop, South, from the text, "Promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor yet from thee, South," which so tickled the witty bishop that he at once presented the preacher to a living. According to Mr. Escott, Miss Hayward's uncle, upon receiving promotion from Lord North, preached with much less point from the same text. It is curious, again, to find Mr. Escott attributing to Wordsworth Lamb's happy description of Coleridge as a "damaged archangel." Here is Mr. Arthur Balfour's first impression of his predecessor in the premiership, Dizzy, "A brazen mask talking his own novels." As for Disraeli, he confessed to Mr. Escott himself an incredible ignorance. When Mr. Escott ventured to suggest to Disraeli that his famous phrase, "exhausted volcanoes," was a plagiarism from Wilkes' excuse for sitting silent through all the French Revolution debates—"I am a burnt-out volcano"—Lord Beaconsfield replied, "Thanks, it looks like a crib; but it's the first time I knew Wilkes ever said anything worth repeating and fit for publication." There are at least a dozen quotable sayings of Wilkes', known to everyone, better worth remembering than this poor phrase, "a burnt-out volcano." Speaking of plagiarism, perhaps the most audacious recorded in the volume is that confessed by the third Sir Robert Peel. When congratulated at a dinner-party, where Kinglake was his fellow-guest, upon a magnificent speech he had made in the House against the annexation of Savoy and Nice by France, Peel, turning first to his host and then to Kinglake, said:—

The speech was the exact oration, word for word, which Kinglake here had addressed in his weak voice to the House. I alone could hear it, as I happened to be sitting next him, and I took it all down and then repeated it in my brazen voice, with the effect upon which you have been congratulating me.

By the way, Mr. Escott—upon the excellent authority of Venables, Thackeray's George Warrington—completely disposes of Froude's picture of Mrs. Carlyle sitting in a solitary corner at Lady Ashburton's, ignored or snubbed by her fashionable fellow-guests:—

"Lady Ashburton," said Venables, to Mr. Escott, "had no little ways, and took care that, in her house at least, the wives of literary men were conceded the rank of their husbands; while from my own knowledge she inspired Mrs. Carlyle with a reciprocated attachment."

To be sure, Mrs. Carlyle, from everything I have read of her, was the last woman in the world to be satisfied with consideration paid to her on any other account than that of her own intellectual supremacy. The last quotation I shall make from this most entertaining book of Mr. Escott's is opportune now that a reckless and unscrupulous section of the press is doing all it can to set Germany and England by the ears. In a letter written by Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff shortly before his death to Mr. Escott, that diplomatist says:—

The Governments and Chanceries of Europe would get on in perfect peace with each other but for a press always trying to excite jealousies and stir up bad feeling. It is a disgusting spectacle, and I thank God I am more than seventy years of age.

My first ventures into fiction this week were not encouraging—Mr. Shiel's "The Last Miracle" (2) and "The Outer Darkness" (3) of Mr. R. H. Wright. Mr. Wright's novel narrates the sufferings of a miser in the world beyond the grave. Here he is made over in a land of perpetual twilight to the charge of the Queen of this murky region, Kotah, the All-Powerful, an incarnate devil of lovely form and loathsome soul. What strikes you most in this incoherent nightmare is, first, that spirits are so far from putting off with the flesh all fleshy temptations that these alone seem to possess them in the other world; and, secondly, that they are punished there, not according to their deserts, but according to the devilish and capricious whims of their infernal Queen. As for Mr. Shiel's bewildering story of the death and faked revival of Christianity, I had in reading it the misgiving Mark Lemon felt in reading "Sordello"—either the author or I am mad. Certainly the form of worship in Mr. Shiel's Church of the Future is no improvement in dignity or decency upon that at present in vogue. If I have been unfortunate in my two first ventures into fiction, I have been more than fortunate in my third, Mr. H. C. Bailey's "Springtime" (4)—a romance of mediæval Italy, exquisitely written, and light and bright as one of Gilbert and Sullivan's comedies. Perhaps Mr. Bailey is not as happy in his heroines as in his heroes. The Countess Lucrezia, who lashes the hero's face with a horsewhip and meditates the murder of her rival, does not fill very amiably the rôle of first heroine; while Cecilia, Marchioness of Frido, on the other hand, is a little too schoolgirlish to be worthy of the gallant Squarcia. But "Springtime," with its big-nosed, big-souled hero, is on the whole the most charming romance I have read for a long time. If you want light comedy in something of the "Three Men in a Boat" style, you must read Messrs. Sheringham and Meakin's "The Enemy's Camp" (5), the romance of a Gladstone bag. It is very light, but very bright comedy, and will certainly pass a pleasant hour for you.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

A new series of volumes dealing with Spain in its various aspects, its history, its cities, and its monuments, is announced by Mr. John Lane. The editor of "The Spanish Series," as it is to be called, is Mr. Albert F. Calvert, and the first two volumes will be a biography and appreciation of Murillo, and a historical account of the Royal Armoury at Madrid. The books will be lavishly illustrated.

It is not as a humorist that Mark Twain deals with "Christian Science" in a book bearing that title which Messrs. Harper will publish shortly. On the contrary, it is described as a work of vital seriousness, the result of years of painstaking study, and a presentation of the writer's sincere views.

Messrs. Longman announce an account of "The Natal Rebellion of 1906," by Walter Bosman, with an introduction by Colonel Mackenzie. Another of this firm's forthcoming books is a study of "The Trust Movement in British Industry," by Mr. Henry W. Macrosty, Lecturer at the London School of Economics.

"The Gold Worshippers" is the title of Mr. Harris-Burland's new novel, which Messrs. Greening will have ready in the course of the next week or so. It is said to be a story of "a very thrilling character." The same firm are also publishing Mr. George R. Sims's "Watches of the Night," a companion volume to his "London by Night."

Dr. Schiller's "Studies in Humanism" is a continuation of his previous work on "Humanism," both on its critical and its constructive side. The new volume will be published by Messrs. Macmillan.

Mr. Archibald Marshall, whose previous stories have been so popular, is the author of a new novel entitled "Exton Manor," which Messrs. Alston Rivers will issue almost immediately. The same firm are also bringing out "Privy Seal," by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer; "Kit's Woman," by Mrs. Havelock Ellis; and "Arminel of the West," by the anonymous author of "A Pixy in Petticoats."

It is understood that Professor Dicey's new book on Egypt will be somewhat critical of the present administration of that country. The volume is to be published by Mr. Heinemann.

In Mr. Bagot's forthcoming novel, "Temptation," the scene is again laid in Italy, but the author shifts his canvas from Rome and the intricacies of Roman society and draws his characters from the ranks of the Italian provincial noblesse. The action of the story takes place in a well-known mediæval city in the Roman province. Messrs. Methuen will publish the book next week.

Mr. Loraine Petre's book, "Napoleon's Conquest of Prussia," to be published by Mr. John Lane, will have a preface by Lord Roberts.

The King and the Prince of Wales have both expressed their pleasure in accepting a copy of Mr. Henry Sharp's "Modern Sporting Gunnery," a volume which has been warmly praised by all sportsmen who are interested in the mechanical and technical aspect of sporting guns and rifles. The publishers are Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall and Co.

In his new book "On Art and Artists," Dr. Max Nordau gives a comprehensive and unconventional view of the development of modern art as represented by some of the best known painters and sculptors. Whistler, Rodin, Meunier, Gustave Moreau, Frank Brangwyn, and Bouguereau are among those whom the author has vividly characterised, and in some cases his judgments differ widely from those generally accepted. The book is published this week by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

Mr. Richard Marsh's new novel "The Romance of a Maid of Honour" will be published by Mr. John Long. In its main currents the story is light reading, but there are also many of those "thrills" which his admirers expect from Mr. Marsh.

A complete reproduction of the beautiful sixteenth century manuscript of the "Hortulus Animæ"—one of the chief treasures of the Imperial Court Library at Vienna—is about to be published by Mr. Oosthock, of Utrecht. Over a hundred pages containing miniatures will be printed in gold and colours, and the remainder in monotone. Messrs. Ellis, 29, New Bond-street, are the English agents for this work, which will be issued in eleven parts.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Little February we call the detective month, because, although the lace on a dress may look perfectly clean on January 31, if the sun shines on February 1 it shows up as too dirty to be worn again. It shows up everything in the unkindest way, shabby carpets, curtains, hats that passed muster well enough in January, and even accuses boots and shoes that had not, until the detective month arrived, had a single stain upon their character. Consequently we have been shopping this week, a pastime that is enjoyable enough, though sometimes it has a bitter after-taste. Some purchases are like a kicking gun. You have the fun of your shot, and then you have the pain of the kick. So many things look nice in the shop and simply horrid when you get them home. Is it not annoying? Carpets are particularly prone to this malign divagation. One takes to the shop bits of the wall-paper, and patterns of the curtains, and of the stuff the furniture is covered with, in order that the colouring of the floor-covering may come well into the scheme. But only too often they fall out with each other, and one cannot exactly return the carpet after having had it made. Life is packed with small worries of this kind, and the true philosopher is she who does not let them fret her. I say "she" and "her," because we are thinking of carpets and other shopping, not because women are more philosophical than men. Perhaps they would be if they smoked as much. Men's serenest moods are when they are under the influence of My Lady Nicotine.

I have just seen a contrivance, invented by a workingman, for preventing an oil lamp exploding. It answers admirably, not only extinguishing the flame of the wick directly the lamp is thrown down, but also preventing the oil escaping. And yet it is a simple device, consisting of an extinguisher which can be affixed to any lamp at a cost of a few pence. To be exact, the price for applying it to a lamp in course of construction would be 5d., and double that amount for a completed lamp, if a slot should have to be made. The inventor was struck by the remarks of a coroner who held an inquest on two poor little children who underwent the cruel death by burning, owing to a lamp exploding. He set to work, produced this simple and inexpensive contrivance, and thought he had thereby prevented much suffering and saved many innocent lives in the future. But do you think the lamp-makers would look at it? No! not one of them. They are all much too conservative. It is the old story—"E's a stranger; let's 'eave 'arf a brick at him." The young inventor will have to take the child of his brain to Germany or the United States, as other British inventors have had to do before him.

In Women's Employment for this month there is an excellent article on "Women for Canada," by Miss Kate Simpson Hayes, president of the Canadian Women's Press Club, who is over here for the purpose of explaining what the conditions of work are over there, and of encouraging women to emigrate to that land of promise. In her article she sketches the kind of woman who is needed, one possessing an all-round knowledge of domestic and business affairs, and yet with some special acquirement of her own, perhaps merely dish-washing, clothes-washing, nursing, house-keeping, teaching, cooking, typing, embroidering. Even the incompetent earn high wages out there, owing to the great lack of women workers, and a prospect of independence and even wealth opens out before the really competent and capable. Energy, honest effort, and hard work are the factors in success. Instances are given of women who have made their way.

Miss Hayes has no sympathy with the gentlewomen who fear to lose their social position by undertaking hard work of any kind. This is the type that is not wanted in Canada, she says. It reminds one of Mrs. Poyser's saying: "It's them as isn't wanted here as ain't wanted above."

Margaret is having a wonderful time in Canada, and writes home such pæans about the Canadians that nothing but her newly-found enthusiasm for England would ever induce her to come back, I think. She was always content to be English in a comfortable, unthinking sort of way, till she went out on this visit to the Dominion. Now she is full of patriotism, not aggressive, but very sincere. She writes that she was ashamed "to take her Englishness so lightly" when she found such a devotion to the Mother-Country animating the Canadians. She is not getting too serious, though; she writes about a dance she was at with most healthy delight. It must have been very pretty, with palms and Japanese vases and screens in each corner, and many hundreds of lanterns of every colour and shape strung overhead, lighted with electric bulbs, "and swaying in sympathy with the swing of the dancers under them. The walls were decorated with open Japanese umbrellas and long panels. The ball programmes had a drawing of lighted lanterns on a dark background, and the evening was called 'A Feast of Lanterns.'" It sounds pretty, does it not? There were 160 guests, the host and hostess being the only married people present, "and she was the most ornamental person in the room; and the 160 were all crazy about dancing, and I thought of the tired, infinitely old, young men of England, and just saw the difference between the countries." Canada is evidently the land of health without hustle, and vigour without vulgarity.

Miss Yuill, who married the Earl of Portarlington last Saturday, had a most covetable trousseau. We saw some of the gowns at Paquin's, and noticed that the modified Empire style is still among us, though many people prophesied at the beginning of the revival that it would last but a few weeks. There was an evening gown of white velvet, quite plain, but with exquisite folds, drawn into a swathed bodice veiled with silver lace caught with a silver rose. Another Empire frock, also for evening wear, had a high yoke and sleeves of Mechlin lace lightened with delicate traceries of silver. The material was pale rose-pink soft satin, which was here and there embroidered in fine silver. The skirt was trimmed with Mechlin lace applied on pale rose-coloured velvet. An afternoon dress of white cloth, with Irish lace, also had a little Empire coat with an embroidered vest. A lovely afternoon frock was in green, with a little coatee of bengalinette, dotted with tiny gold buttons, and relieved with fine lace. The skirt, in soft green silk, was veiled with black mousseline de soie, a very French idea, and remarkably smart. A lovely pale grey cloth mantle, with a collar of velvet embroidered in gold and Oriental colours, was entirely lined with ermine, that regal fur.

We had a private view of the Peri-lusta competition embroideries, and enjoyed ourselves very much in seeing some extremely beautiful work. The competitors, in view of the handsome money prizes, had put their best foot forward, or, should I say, best hand? The work was divided into coloured Peri-lusta and white, and the former proved a snare to many, who evidently love colour not wisely but too well. Some of their combinations of tint were emphatic beyond expression, though they had all the lovely shades of the beautiful threads from which to choose. The minority, however, made up for the excesses of the majority by the delicate refinement of their harmonies. There was a bedspread in white and pale green which seemed like a draught of cool water after some of the violent heats and rages perpetrated on other pieces. The first-prize piece in this selection was a composed and dignified heraldic design divided into squares and carried out in beautifully modified shades. The work was smooth and even and almost as neat on the wrong side as on the right, and the fine lustre of the threads had not suffered from over-handling, a great point in these embroideries.

From all parts of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland came the pieces of work, as well as from further afield, we were told, and the roomful of competitive pieces testified to the popularity of Peri-lusta. From far-away Vancouver arrived one piece. Some of the designs were very new and uncommon. One, in particular, represented the interior of a convent, with altar and stained-glass window, and three monks evidently doing penance, for each carried a lighted candle as they approached the altar in single file.

The white work contained some specimens of very remarkable beauty. One of these was a white petticoat trimmed with a furlong or so of wide knitted lace done with the finest Peri-lusta knitting threads, yet so strong as to be practically everlasting. Two centuries hence some girl may be handling that lace and saying, "Oh, what patience the dear woman had who knitted this! I wonder what she was like." There were wonderful bed-spreads embroidered in finest stitchery, with drawn-thread work, some with broderie anglaise introduced, and one or two trimmed round with knitted or crocheted edgings of Peri-lusta. Table-centres, sideboard cloths, d'oyleys (one set in exquisitely fine crochet), duchess cloths and mats to match, tray cloths, were in profusion. There were also embroidered dresses and blouses, children's frocks, sweet little knitted and crocheted jackets for new babies, shawls of every size, some of them soft and fine as Shetland, and many other useful and pretty things. Persons who fear that the needle's art is dying out among us may be reassured. There are nimble fingers carrying it on into the twentieth century with as much skill and assiduity as have ever been applied to this, one of the oldest of the arts. One of the principal prizes was, very appropriately, secured by a Leek lady. Leek, as you know, is the acknowledged home of up-to-date embroidery.

The Royal Irish Industries Association has always held its St. Patrick's Day Sale at one of the great town houses of the nobility—the late Lord Salisbury's, in Arlington-street, Londonderry House, Downshire House, Grosvenor House, Lansdowne House, Seaford House, etc.—but this year there is to be a change. The Associations has secured the magnificent suite of reception rooms and ballroom at the Hotel Ritz, in Piccadilly. The great size of these lovely rooms and their artistic beauty will make a fine setting for the beautiful work always seen at these sales. As St. Patrick's Day will fall on a Sunday this year, the sale is to be held on Tuesday and Wednesday, the 19th and 20th of March.

Do you dread the periodical hair-washings which disturb the peace of every woman? They are so tiring, the rubbing, and squeezing, and the little trickles of cold or hot water, and then the horrid tedious business of getting dry by slow degrees, followed by the probability of a cold and the certainty of a wild, unmanageable head for two or three days. Even going out and having a shampoo at a hairdresser's is a long business, though certainly the hot air is preferable to the crouching in front of a fire which is the penalty of the home process. Bee indulged in a shampoo in "uninflammable Enna" the other day. It cost more, "in mere cash," as she put it afterwards, but she is delighted with it. The whole process took less than twenty minutes; she leaned her head back, the stuff was poured over it, and in a few minutes her hair was dry. It has looked lovely since, and not too soft, and Bee says it was worth the extra money to escape the rubbing over the tender parts of the skull. She went to Regent-street for her first trial, but is going to do it at home next time as it is so easy. Although there is petrol in it, it is really uninflammable—the Post Offices all over the world accept it, which is proof of its safety. It is a boon to any one, but particularly, I should think, to invalids.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Castle seasons come round for us regularly in their course as Christmas and other festive times do, promoting the amusement of society and benefiting trade and innumerable industries. They do a great deal more besides: they give something to talk about, to criticise, and, as a necessary consequence, to grumble at. Above all, they give us something to dress for—men and women both. We could better spare many a better thing than our Viceregal Court; one shudders to think of what Dublin would be without it. No opportunities for the wear of Court dress, for the gauds and vanities so dear to feminine hearts; for trains, feathers, lappets, and all the courtly extras of attire; nor for those equally dear to manly ones, for garb of brilliant colours, gold and silver embroideries, sashes, ribbons, stars and orders.

The Castle season which began last week gave us something more than usual to talk about, as the traditional Drawing Room, in some ways a unique ceremonial and a speciality of Dublin Castle, was abolished, the old order giving place to the new. With the object of letting the many who hold hard by tradition down easy, the name of Drawing Room was retained for the two "Courts" held on Wednesday and Thursday nights respectively. One wonders who had such a thoughtful and original idea. In one way the change is not popular, as it makes the Drawing Room more of a mere Court ceremonial and less of a party. Every one, however, is made more comfortable, there is no crowding, and every one has the fullest opportunity of displaying her Court costume. The oldest inhabitant does not remember a Viceregal Drawing Room ever before being held in the spacious Patrick's Hall. The innovation proved very successful, the Patrick's Hall forming a most effective mise en scène for such a State ceremonial. The Lord Lieutenant and Lady Aberdeen sat enthroned at one side of the room, with their staff, household and guests of distinction. Prominent amongst the latter were the new Chief Secretary and Mrs. Birrell, who had only arrived in Ireland the previous evening, and were having their first view of the "society" set of the distressful country, whose "distresses" it has now been given into Mr. Birrell's hands to alleviate. One cannot but think that the Chief Secretary must have been somewhat surprised at the sight of the matrons and maidens in beautiful Court dresses, who passed through the Patrick's Hall making their obeisances to their Excellencies. Their sparkling jewels and frequently very fair faces suggested anything but distressful ideas. And then on Mr. Birrell's and your side of the Channel you so exclusively think of the daughters of Erin as if they all lived in cabins and amongst mountains and bogs.

Lady Aberdeen wore black satin trimmed with Irish lace and green embroidery—Irish made as well—her train was of panne with the same style of trimming. Her jewels—diamonds, emeralds, and rubies—were magnificent. Her daughter, Lady Marjorie Sinclair, was beautifully dressed in white velvet, chiffon, and many diamonds. Lady Aberdeen had two picturesque little pages in attendance, the sons respectively of Lord Fingall and Sir John Arnott, who were St. Patrick's blue—that is, the sons, not their fathers. Lady Annesley was in the latest Empire fashion, with a white gown and blue train all gold embroidery, and of course with gorgeous jewels. Lady Grenfell was in sapphire blue, with iridescent trimming and lovely Alençon lace. Lady MacDonnell's Court dress was a dream of courtly beauty—white chiffon velvet trimmed with gold embroidery and lovely lace, and a train of gold brocade lined with white satin. Her daughter wore a train of gold tissue covered with silver tulle, and dress of lilac crêpe de chine and embroidery. Lady Wicklow's train was of Brussels lace, with a dress of white satin, silver, and lace. Lady Arnott wore a delicate pink dress sparkling with crystal and diamante trimming, and a train of silver cloth and Brussels lace. The list of lovely toilettes would be too long to enumerate; never was there a better-dressed Drawing Room in Dublin Castle. Fashionable materials just now are so beautiful in their softness and delicacy, and the trimmings so effective in their lightness and brightness. However it may be as regards figures, at least as regards attire the feminine world seems determined to be fairy-like. Amongst those who presented daughters were Ladies Clarina, O'Neill, Stopford, Butler, Margaret Proby, Plumer, Kenmare, Stronge, Belmore. Lady Augusta Fane was presented by Lady Powerscourt, Lady Cynthia Crewe Milnes was with her sister, Lady Celia Coates. Those who brought daughters included Lady Granard, Lady Mowbray and Stourton, Lady Clinton—the Dowager who has lately been living in Ireland—Ladies Holmpatrick, Shaw, Arnott, Gwendoline O'Shee, Fermoy. The Misses Ponsonby were with Lady Mayo. Lady Iveagh's niece, Miss Marjorie Guinness, was presented by Mrs. Claude Guinness. Ladies Dunsany, Muriel Close, Clementine Waring, Hawkesbury, Bellew, Pirrie, and many others, wore handsome dresses. Dainty bouquets in most cases completed the Court costumes, and of course feathers and lappets waved and floated on every feminine head.

Lord and Lady Grenfell's ball at the Royal Hospital on the night before the first "Court" was a very brilliant entertainment. Lord and Lady Aberdeen, with a large Viceregal party, were present, and the elect of society assembled in Dublin for the Castle ceremonials. The dresses of the majority of our sex were simply dreams of bright and early beauty; the large military contingent was in full dress and highly decorative.

Lord Iveagh did not remain in Dublin for the Levee, and Lord and Lady Ardilaun went at the beginning of last week to Ashford, in Galway, where they had their usual woodcock shooting party.—Yours ever, Clare.

Here are my recipes. Macaroni and oysters are a tempting dish:—

Boil 4oz. of macaroni till it is tender, then cut it into pieces an inch long, put it into good white sauce. Blanch and beard a dozen oysters, make a little sauce with the reduced liquor, add a squeeze of lemon juice, a pinch of salt and pepper, the yolk of an egg, and a little cream. Line a buttered fireproof dish with the macaroni, pour in the oyster preparation, cover it with the remainder of the macaroni, spread a little grated cheese and cream, mixed together, on the top, and bake it a nice brown colour.

Partridges à la Napolitaine:—

Cut a couple of partridges into halves, sautez them with a minced onion and 2 oz. of butter until brown, dust them with flour, then add 1 lb. of ripe tomatoes, cut in quarters, a minced red chilli, and a gill of stock; stir them till they are hot, then cover them closely, and simmer them for two hours. Remove the birds and keep them hot while rubbing the sauce through a hair sieve. Re-heat the birds in the sauce, adding a glass of any light wine. Dish them in a circle, with inch length pieces of macaroni in the centre, the sauce poured round them, and groups of button onions in groups.

Suprême de Dindon à l'aspic is an agreeable dish:—

Take about 12 oz. of the meat of a cold boiled turkey and pound it thoroughly, adding 2 oz. of butter, a spoonful of white sauce, half a gill of thick cream, and salt and pepper to taste, rub the meat through a wire sieve and mix it with half a gill of liquid aspic, adding two or three extra sheets of dissolved gelatine and a tablespoonful of clear, pale-coloured glaze, pour the purée into a dish to set. Set a plain mould with aspic and decorate it with crescent-shaped pieces of truffle and red cooked carrot, cut the purée with a cutlet-shaped cutter, dipped in hot water, and arrange them round the mould, overlapping each other, put scallops of truffle, artichoke bottoms and foie gras in the centre, pour in sufficient dissolved aspic to cover it, and when it is set repeat the layers of purée and aspic, allowing each one to set before another is added. When the mould is set, turn it out on a dish, garnish it with chopped aspic and serve celery and beetroot salad separately.

Lièvre en surprise:—

Having cleansed and skinned a nice leveret, take the bones carefully from the back, without breaking the second skin, sautez the liver with that of a rabbit, adding 2 oz. of dice-shaped pieces of fat bacon, 2 oz. of butter, 2 finely chopped shallots, a sprig of thyme, and a sprig or two of parsley, after which pound and rub it through a hair sieve. Pound the flesh of a rabbit, adding 4 oz. of scraped fat bacon, 2 oz. of butter, 2 whole eggs, pepper, salt, and the passed liver. Spread the farce on the inside of the leveret, sprinkle it with chopped tongue and parsley, add the remainder of the farce, draw the flaps together, sew them securely, and truss the leveret into shape, cover the back with slices of fat bacon, and braise it with stock from the bones, adding vegetables and herbs to season, for about two hours. When ready to serve, remove the bacon, brush the leveret over with glaze, and garnish with groups of red tongue and macaroni. Serve good celery sauce in a boat.

Pain d'épinards à la crême is a plat that will please vegetarians:—

Well wash and boil 3 lbs. of spinach, squeeze every particle of water from it, and rub it through a wire sieve. Put it into a stewpan with half a gill of thick white sauce, and salt and pepper to taste; cover it closely and allow it to steam on the side of the stove for 20 minutes, then remove it to cool a little; mix in 2 yolks, and one whole egg. Line the bottom and sides of a buttered and papered plain mould with the spinach, fill the centre with minced hard-boiled eggs, mixed with a little white sauce, the yolk of a fresh egg, and a spoonful of grated cheese, cover it with the remainder of the spinach, twist a buttered paper over it, and steam it for three-quarters of an hour. Serve it with creamy white sauce poured round it.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

The STANDARD says:—"Few men saw more of the Second Empire in its rise, its supremacy, and its decline. He has in consequence much to tell which is of more than passing interest, for these two volumes contain vivid sidelights on French Society and Politics, as well as on the war with Austria, which marked the beginning of Napoleon's downfall. The letters of 'Malakoff' are, in short, full of purple patches, the bits of vivid colour which an historian of the Second Empire could turn to admirable account in a picture of Paris, in peace and war, under Napoleon III., but, apart from that, people who relish political and social gossip concerning Napoleon may turn with reasonable expectations to these volumes."

THE TIMES (1st review) says: "A strong and poignant story."

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "MR. AND MRS. VILLIERS."

6s.

 Now and then a novel is issued which stands conspicuously forth as being of different mould to all others, and readers turn to it with avidity. Such was "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers" a first book by Mr. Hubert Wales, which straightway achieved distinction. In his new novel, "The Yoke," he displays a more startling originality and an even greater freedom. It may be in venturing to issue it the publisher will incur some adverse criticism, but be that as it may it will undoubtedly let loose the dogs of controversy. The advance bookings are very heavy, and those who would secure an early copy should place their orders at once.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "CHILDREN OF EARTH."

THE FOLLY OF THE WISE

By G. SIDNEY PATERNOSTER. 6s.

 Mr. Paternoster's new novel is a love story, the love story of a woman of wit and beauty, who awakens so keen a rivalry among her admirers that the result would be disastrous to herself had she the fear of Mrs. Grundy before her eyes.

London: JOHN LONG, 13 & 14, Norris-street, Haymarket.

THE HOUSE OF A THOUSAND CANDLES.

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON.

Ladies' Field.—"From beginning to end it is one long thrill of excitement, and carries the reader breathlessly along from the first page to the last."
Daily Mail.—"Will recommend it heartily to all."
World.—"Brightly written, meriting the success we understand it has achieved in America."

THE HOUSE OF A THOUSAND CANDLES.

Truth.—"The reader's attention is not allowed to relax until 'Finis' is written."
Star.—"The plot is almost impregnably clever. You cannot guess the secret till very near the end. The perilous position of the hero is very cheering. You feel that he is bound to be killed on every page. The fight in the dark between him and Morgan is very soothing. I like the thought of two men crawling in a gloomy subterranean corridor and firing revolvers at each other. It must be quite exciting. You could not know what moment would be the next. The other complications in this lively book are very ingenious, and on the whole I think it is the finest novel of pure sensation we have had for years."
Literary World.—"The dénouement is unique, and will, we venture to suppose, never be guessed by the most experienced reader. The book is brightly written, and the interest never fails."

MR. PRATT.

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN

MR. PRATT.

Daily Mail says:—"It is a delightful tale."

Daily Telegraph says:—"For those healthy people who like to laugh when they read, this is a book that may be heartily recommended."

Birmingham Owl.—"Mr. Pratt is a genuine find."

Tatler.—"A clever American, Mr. Joseph C. Lincoln, has just had published a very amusing story of the W. W. Jacobs type called 'Mr. Pratt.' Two well-to-do Americans decide to live the simple life for a few months. They rent a small uninhabited island with a dilapidated house and press Mr. Pratt, an old seaman, into their services. They have many adventures and a very amusing time."

The following are in great demand at the Libraries.

The following notice of the Prospectus referred to below is issued by way of information only, and not for the purpose of inviting subscriptions, and no applications will be entertained unless the same are made on the footing of and with reference to such Prospectus, copies of which can be obtained from the Solicitors and Bankers, and at the Offices of the Company.

The SUBSCRIPTION LIST will CLOSE on or before February 8, 1907.

The Prospectus is dated 31st January, 1907, and has been duly filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies.

GENERAL INVESTORS AND TRUSTEES, Limited.

(Incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-1900.)

SHARE CAPITAL £1,000,000, divided into

100,000 Cumulative 4½ per Cent. Preference Shares of £5 each ...	£500,000
100,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each	500,000
	£1,000,000

FIRST ISSUE OF

60,000 PREFERENCE SHARES	£300,000
60,000 ORDINARY SHARES	300,000
	£600,000

The Preference Shares carry a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum on the amount for the time being paid up thereon, and rank both as regards dividend and capital in priority to the Ordinary Shares.

Of the above issue, 20,000 Ordinary Shares (being the maximum allowed by the Rules of the Stock Exchange) and 10,000 Preference Shares are to be issued and credited as paid up in satisfaction of the purchase price of the securities acquired as a first operation by the Company.

SUBSCRIPTIONS are INVITED by the Prospectus for the remaining—

50,000 Cumulative 4½ per Cent. Preference Shares of £5 each;

40,000 Ordinary Shares of £5 each;

Payable as follows:—

PREFERENCE SHARES—5s. on Application; 20s. on Allotment; 25s. on 15th March, 1907; 25s. on 15th May, 1907; 25s. on 15th July, 1907.

ORDINARY SHARES—5s. on Application; 20s. on Allotment; 25s. on 15th March, 1907; and the balance as and when called up, in accordance with the Company's Articles of Association.

The Preference Shares may be paid up in full on Allotment, under discount at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

Dividends will be payable half-yearly on the Preference Shares, the first dividend, calculated on the several instalments from the due dates thereof, being payable on the 1st July, 1907.

The subscription at par of the entire amount of Preference and Ordinary Shares offered by the Prospectus has been guaranteed without commission, in consideration of the right conferred on the guarantors to a preferential allotment at par of one-third of the unissued Ordinary Shares (forming part of the Original Capital), in the event of such shares being offered for subscription within a period of five years from the formation of the Company.

The Directors and their friends have applied for Shares amounting in all (with the Shares for which they have signed the Memorandum of Association) to 4,000 Preference and 11,000 Ordinary Shares on the terms of the Prospectus.

SECRETARY and OFFICES.

JAMES DAVENPORT, 75-76, Lombard-street, London, E.C.

The Company has been formed to conduct the business of a Trust and Investment Company, as defined in its Memorandum of Association. The Directors believe that the present is a favourable time for engaging in such an enterprise, securities being generally free from inflation, and the conditions of trade throughout the world being of a satisfactory character.

It has been shown by experience that a well-managed investment company enjoys many advantages which are not usually within the reach of a private individual, who cannot, generally, exercise that vigilance essential to successful results. The former is in a position, while, as a rule, a private investor is not, to make the investigations necessary to ascertain the real position and intrinsic value and prospects of the undertakings in which it contemplates investing its capital.

The Company, as a first operation, has entered into an agreement to acquire securities and investments (spread over 25 different undertakings, including Railways, Electric Power and Lighting, Tramways, and Industrials), at the price of £150,000. No cash will be paid on account of the purchase consideration, which will be satisfied as to £50,000 by the issue of 10,000 of the above Preference Shares credited as fully paid, and as to the remaining £100,000 by the issue of 20,000 Ordinary Shares credited as fully paid. The Vendors have agreed to hold these Shares for a period of not less than three years in the names of the Vendors or the survivor of them if the survivor shall so long live.

The Securities and Investments so agreed to be acquired by the Company consist of property acquired by Messrs. B. Newgass and Co., of 75-76, Lombard Street, London, E.C. (the Vendors), during recent years in the course of their business, and represent:—

£128,650 Debenture and Mortgage Bonds, £19,480 Preference Shares, £26,895 Ordinary Shares } yielding, as appears below, an income at the rate of £8,729 7s. 0d. per annum,

The capital offered by the Prospectus for subscription will be utilised for the purposes of the business of the Company as above outlined, subject to the limitation provided for in the Articles of Association that no investment shall be made whereby more than 5 per cent. of the issued capital at the date of such investment shall become invested in any one undertaking, other than stocks, funds, and securities authorised by law as Trustees' Investments.

The Company will have the benefit of the valuable experience of Mr. B. Newgass, who has agreed to act as Managing Director for a term of three years from the 31st January, 1907, without further remuneration than the £200 per annum payable to him as Director under Article 96 of the Articles of Association, plus such share of the 15 per cent. hereinafter mentioned as may be agreed between himself and the Directors of the Company. Messrs. B. Newgass & Co. have also agreed to supply the Staff and Offices at 75-76, Lombard-street, E.C., for a term of three years at an inclusive sum of £1,750 per annum.

It is the intention of the Board to create out of the profits a substantial Reserve Fund, which they consider should ultimately be not less than 30 per cent. of the issued capital.

Nothing is payable for goodwill. There are no promotion profits, and there are no syndicate or underwriting commissions, with the exception of the above-mentioned option, but a brokerage of 6d. per share will be allowed on shares allotted upon applications bearing a broker's stamp.

An official settlement and quotation on the Stock Exchange will be applied for.

The Prospectus contains particulars of Contracts and other information required to be furnished by the Companies Act, 1900. Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association and of the Contracts can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors of the Company at any time during business hours. The Prospectus and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Solicitors and Bankers, and at the Offices of the Company.

PEKIN SYNDICATE.—An ordinary general meeting of the members of the Pekin Syndicate, Limited, was held on Thursday at the Cannon Street Hotel E.C. Mr Carl Meyer (Chairman of the Company) stated that the position in round figures was that during 1906 they spent on the development of the mines about £70,000, and they had further sent various remittances to China in connection with acquisitions of lands and wharves, which would be required later on for the purpose of the business. At the present moment their assets consisted of as nearly as possible £800,000 nominal Five per Cent. Chinese Government Gold Railway bonds, and they also had cash assets of about £150,000; in addition they had the interests in China which he had mentioned, as well as their interest in the Chinese Central Railways, to which he referred at last year's meeting. Their available assets therefore amounted to about £1,000,000. It had been a year full of disappointment to all of them, but the Board could not have foreseen or have prevented all the difficulty, all the mining trouble that had arisen, unless they had been able to see into the bowels of the earth or been gifted with the possession of second sight. The troubles and disappointments they had had to contend against were, however, only the troubles and disappointments which were incident to every mining enterprise. He then referred at some length to a letter which had been published within the last few days addressed to him, as chairman of the Syndicate, by Mr. Luzzatti, to whose energy, he reminded the shareholders, the creation of the Syndicate and the obtaining of the original concession for the provinces of Shansi and Honan were due. The principal reproach contained in the letter was because they had so far not done anything in Shansi and had begun work at Honan. This was a point which his colleague, Mr. Jamieson, would deal with later, but he might himself mention if anyone would read his last year's speech he would find the directors' reasons for the policy referred to. Before addressing the letter in question to him, Mr. Luzzatti paid him a friendly visit and explained his views. He strongly urged them to begin work at Shansi, and not to mind the opposition of the local authorities and people, adding that if some of the Syndicate's engineers and staff should be killed they would have a good case for compensation from the Chinese Government. That policy, however, was one which did not commend itself to the Directors, and he would be very sorry to do anything to jeopardise the life of any member of their staff. Then their friend said that they ought long ago to have strengthened the Board by the election of a gentleman belonging to the Asiatic race. He did not see how the Syndicate would be strengthened in the opinion of European investors by putting a Chinese gentleman of high standing—if one could be found—on the Board; and as to reserving their unissued capital for Chinese banks, he feared that they would have to reserve it for a very long time indeed should they require money at any future date. Mr. Luzzatti thought that the directorate ought to be strengthened by the addition of a member who was technically conversant with the difficult problems which were confronting them, and which might confront them. Last summer he accidentally met in Switzerland the Marquis di Rudini, the much-esteemed friend and associate of Mr. Luzzatti in his early Chinese travels, and the Marquis volunteered the statement to him that the Italian shareholders, so far as he knew, had the fullest confidence in the management of the Syndicate. He wished to repeat what he said at their last meeting—that the Directors were convinced that the Syndicate's concessions were as valuable now as they were when they were first obtained. Mr. George Jamieson, in seconding the motion, observed that until quite recently Shansi was altogether inaccessible to them, whereas Honan lay at their feet, so to speak. He afterwards amplified the reasons why they began work on the Honan concession, and referred to the many difficulties against which they had had to contend in connection with the boring and other operations. He desired to take that opportunity of saying that during the whole of his sojourn in China he had had much to do with the British Legation and the officials, and from first to last he had found them most sympathetic and energetic in their support. Mr. Luzzatti afterwards addressed the meeting. The Chairman replied, and afterwards put the motion, which he declared carried unanimously. The retiring Directors, Mr. James G. H. Glass and Mr. Robert Miller, were afterwards re-elected.

ROBERT WIGRAM, } Directors.

R. T. HAINES,
T. ESTALL,
D. J. H. CUNNICK, } Joint General Managers.

In accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1900, we certify that all our requirements as Auditors have been complied with: and we report that we have ascertained the correctness of the Cash Balances and the Money at Call and Short Notice at the Head Office, and the securities representing the investments of the Bank; and having examined the Balance Sheet in detail with the Books at the Head Office and with the certified returns from each Branch, we are of opinion that such Balance Sheet is full and fair and properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Bank's affairs, as shown by such Books and Returns.

EDWIN WATERHOUSE,
WILLIAM BARCLAY PEAT, } Auditors.

18th January, 1907.

At the Annual General Meeting (Robert Wigram, Esq., in the chair) the above Report was adopted. The retiring Directors—The Earl of Lichfield, Sir James L. Mackay, G.C.M.G., K.C.I.E., and Colin F. Campbell, Esq., were re-elected. Mr. Edwin Waterhouse and Mr. William Barclay Peat were re-appointed Auditors for the current year. The best thanks of the proprietors were given to the Directors, General Managers, Branch Managers, and other Officers of the Bank for their efficient services, and to the Chairman for his able conduct in the chair.

The National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, having numerous Branches in England and Wales, as well as Agents and Correspondents at home and abroad, affords great facilities to its customers, who may have money transmitted to the credit of their Accounts through any of the Branches, free of charge.

At Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, Deposits are received and interest allowed thereon at the rates advertised by the Bank in the London newspapers from time to time, and Current Accounts are conducted on the usual terms.

At the Country Branches, Current Accounts are opened, Deposits received, and all other Banking business conducted.

The Bank undertakes the Agency of Private and Joint Stock Banks, also the Purchase and Sale of all British and Foreign Stocks and Shares, and the collection of Dividends, Annuities, &c.

Circular Notes and Letters of Credit, payable at the principal towns abroad, are issued for the use of Travellers.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy as regards the transactions of its customers.

Copies of the Annual Report of the Bank, Lists of Branches, Agents, and Correspondents, may be had on application at the Head Office, and at any of the Bank's Branches.

OUR PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,463.

It is a common subject of remark how completely VALENTINE'S DAY, once so generally observed in this country, has fallen into almost universal desuetude.

What the reason of this is, or whether there is any reason, I do not profess to know. Possibly, however, some of my Competitors may be able to throw light on the problem. And to encourage them to do so, I am offering, this week, the usual Prize of Two Guineas for:

THE BEST EPIGRAMMATIC ESSAY, IN NOT MORE THAN ONE HUNDRED WORDS, THAT SHALL SUPPLY SOME PLAUSIBLE REASON, OR REASONS, FOR THE DECLINE AND FALL OF VALENTINE'S DAY.

The Essays should be in prose and as pithy and pointed as possible.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) No Competitor must send in more than one Essay.
(ii.) All Essays must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday February 18, at latest.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication, to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Building, Carteret street, Queen Anne's-gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom de plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new Competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of THERSITES, winner of one-fourth TRUTH Prize No. 1,454, is R. L. Wherry, Esq., Eton Lodge, Don-road, St. Helier, Channel Islands.

SIMPLEX.—I much regret, and duly note, the typographical errors which you point out.

PROVIDENT AND RHO.—I much regret that your Solutions of Puzzle No. 1,459 were received too late for inclusion.

DIFISEL.—Many thanks for your card. Your name and address duly noted.

TEMPLAR.—Very pleased to welcome you once more after so long an interval. I hope I may now have the pleasure of receiving your Solutions regularly.

IOLIO.—The rule, of which you speak, refers only to special Queer Story Puzzle of December 19 last. In the ordinary course, our Puzzle Competitors should send in their names and addresses on the first occasion of their competing.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,460.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

BEST SET OF RHYMED LINES OF VAGARIES OF ENGLISH VERBS.

"I fly to thee, love!" and with rapture he flew.
"I cry to thee, love!" and with passion he crew.
"Oh, try me, dear love!" (a few others had trew).

"Let me tell thee, sweet love, all there is to be told,
How thou dwellest in this heart" (where some others had dwoled).
"Oh, my heart swells with love!" (as before it had swoled).

"Oh, shake not thy head, love!"—his pleading voice shook—
"Oh, wakes not thy heart? Has thy heart never wook?"
But her mien made him quake, so he stood still and quook!

"Thy presence I'll fly!" he cried as he flew,
But fell on the step and lay still. As he lew
With closed eyes, he said, "I shall die!" and he dew! Arachne.

A REMINISCENCE OF A SNOWY SUNDAY.

The snowy path to church I trod,
And saw two shivering creatures wod;
The solemn rite they greatly drod.

I liked the sermon that you praught,
With highest moral teaching fraught;
But oh! the babies—how they scraught!

And afterwards I vainly traught
To smoke those vile cigars you bought,
And in the struggle nearly dought.

And after, when of ghosts we spoke,
You gibbered horribly, and squoke;
And Lord! what shrieks the housemaid shroke! Sponge.

THE ROUT OF THE SUFFRAGETTES.

The Suffragettes a vow did make in solemn conclave made,
"That Parliament we'll wake," they said, "and till it has been wade,
The Bobbies take us round the waist (as women should be took),
We'll kick and squirm until they ache as never man has ook;
For holding us, they soon will find, when we dislike being held,
Like folding of a hedgehog up when he will not be feld.
An awkward job to bring about, but if at last we're brought Before the Beak, in dock we'll cling as none before has clought."
But see! What's this? A dreaded form appears upon the scene,
A mouse! "Agree to fly," they cry. . . . It was, nem. con., agreen. Oiseau.

The long-winded speaker he spoke,
The poor office-seeker he soke,
The swimmer he swam, the skimmer he skam,
And the shrieker he horribly shroke.

The flier to Jericho flew,
The buyer on credit he bew,
The deer he did, the sner he sid,
And the liar (a fisherman) lew.

The writer, this nonsense he wrote,
The fighter (an editor) fote,
The runner he ran, the dunner he dan,
And the biter was hungry and bote. Nichola.

When Uncle Charles his aeroplane had bought,
On his own judgment he had not relought.
But all his friends with questions daily plought,
Until at last in ecstasy he crought,
"Hurrah! Hurrah! It cannot be denought,
That I with motors, birds, balloons have vought,
And all the laws of gravity defought."
But when to soar from mother earth he trought,
And rose triumphant, calm and dignifought,
Alas! down came the car, he fell, and dought—
So, dying, he with Newton's laws complought,
With Dædulus and Icarus allought. Whig.

The thinker on politics thought,
The drinker some spirit he drought,
The maker he made,
The taker he tade,
While the winker most knowingly wought.

This writer a puzzle he wrote,
The fighter a battle he fote,
The striker he struck,
The biker he buck,
And the biter at last he was bote. Almaviva.

MY NEW BOAT.

A boat from a block I'd dig. I dug.
"My boat," I said, "I will rig." I rug.
"On the deck thereof I'll jig." I jug.

I saw my finger bleed, how it bled!
"Plaster I need." I found what I ned.
"In future my knife I'll heed." I hed.

A friend came up to speak, and he spoke.
He said, "It will surely leak." It loke.
"A lump of putty go seek." I soke.

I said to my cronies "Come!" They came.
"See, through the water 'twill hum." It hame.
"The wind on the shrouds will strum." It strame. Nemo.

Said Balfour, "A seat I must find"—which he found,
"Joe's little pet schemes I must mind"—and he mound,
"Good for evil return and be kind"—he be kound,
"And depend on my wiles him to blind"—and he blound.

"To Protection," said Joe, "I will stick"—so he stuck,
"To my views Tories all I must trick"—and he truck,
"'Gainst Protection," C.-B. said, "I'll kick"—so he kuck.
"And Tariff Reformers I'll lick—and he luck.

"With Birrell's Act," quoth the Lords, "we'll soon deal"—and they dealt,
"Its fate we will very soon seal"—and they sealt,
"Our presumption will make Commons kreel"—and they realt,
"The breach caused by our act must soon heal"—has it healt? Xicor.

The earth began to shake; it sharp and badly shook.
It hastened then to quake; most horribly it quook!
"For the country let us make"; and all there quickly mook.
"Round us the walls will break!" Sure enough, they straightway brook.

In th' club 'tis nice to sit; that day a guest there sat.
He saw the roof would hit; as it fell it sorely hat.
His coat was tight to quit, but he got out and quat.
From th' window he could flit, safely he gained and flat.
For goods folk did not feel, t'was over e'er they felt.
Howe'er, thieves like to steal, and much treasure then they stelt.
To this island help we'll send, its neighbours some have sent.
The town they soon will mend—perhaps it's nearly ment. Musapha.

THE TEETOTALLER'S WARNING.

He would drink, but I cried 'ere he drank,
"Pause and think!" But he paused not nor thank,
But did wink and imbibed as he wank.

Oh tread not where others have trod!
I dread your fate, theirs as I drod;
Drink's net's spread as ever 'twas sprod.

Fight this foe, for he sure must be fought;
Drink will bite, as it ever has bought;
I would fright you as you should be frought;
Slight not warning; it should not be slought! Cortex.

He wished them to ring up the girl, and they rang;
But he did not expect her to bring what she brang,
So the thing 'twas his custom to fling her, he flang.

Then remorse made him write his regret, so he wrote,
But "the dust," she declared, "he should bite," and he bote.
Though his pipe he was longing to light, and he lote.

Then the tale he was burning to tell her he told,
And he begged she would smile in reward, and she smoled,
But the letter her ma wished to file, and she feld.

And his rash act induced him to think, what he thought,
Vain his friends tried to warn by the wink which they wought,
'Twas too late when he saw he must sink, so he sought. Gilt Stick.

I am making this verse, I'll be glad when it's made,
Tho' it may take the prize I don't reckon it tade.
There's an ache in my heart as it ne'er before ade.

Oh if I could but get what there is to be got.
If the fates would me let I should like to be sot.
So my muse I will pet, 'twill be pleased, being pot.

Soon to TRUTH this shall go, as the other fellas' went.
I shall soon know my fate, but I wish that I knent.
I shall crow if I win, those who're won ever crent.

So I think day and night as I ne'er before thought,
And my glass I now clink and put down when I've clought,
As I drink to success as it's always been drought. Iolaus.

THE NEW THEORTHOGRAPHY

Were't well the New Theology to teach or not,
'tis taught.
But yet by Pastor Campbell, though he preach it,
'tis not praught:
Or did he choose to write it, he to man and woman wrote
(Did he invite them too, and were these voteless dames invote?).

But no! methinks he speaks it, and thereby put in his "spoke."
('Tis certain did one speak it, that it is not therefore spoken).
If other pastors bring it, 'twill to that extent be brought;
Exceptionally, should they sing it, 'twill—sometimes—be sought.
'Verts may grow up like grass, and men may marvel how they grew.
They'll be cut down like grass (did he who mows them—eat like mew?).
Some, longing much to slay it, would rejoice to see it slain;
But given rope to play, it then, to plain men, will be plain.
Trebor Nitram.

If we ne'er forgot what we'd been taught,
More often practised what we praught;
Of our neighbours faults ne'er jeered,
And always our own business meaned;
When to us the poor appelt,
More pity for their sufferings felt;
Tales of scandal never told,
And all our words correctly spold:
If no one fought or disagreed,
How happy the world might be indeed!
Cherry-picker.

AFTER A TIFF.

Why speak again? She declares I spoke
More than enough. Yet I seek, as oft I soke,
To know the reason why. 'S'truth! I never knew
Woman such waywardness show, as she hath shew.
The sun may shine, as ne'er it shone,
Still I incline, as always I incline,
To think she loves me. Mayhap I wrongly thought,
And now shrink the ordeal—yet my heart ne'er shrought
To find the truth o' things. Still, what if I found
She still minds her troth, as mine I always mound?
Ah! this cruel doubt doth wear my soul, as nothing e'er wore;
I fear the worst. (Later) Alas! 'tis as I fore.
Diffsel.

IF.

If the public could tell when it's truth that is told;
If its leaders would speak what of right should be spoken,
All falsities quell as they ought to be quold.
And no bitter words seek which are not soken;
If our schools would but teach what is best to be taught,
And our parsons Peace preach as 'tis meet it were praught!

Then at tables we'd feed where true wisdom is ted;
At fountains we'd drink where true knowledge is drunk;
Great truths we should heed as philosophers hed,
Great thoughts we should think by the sages once thunk;
And we rhymsters e'en write what we'd wish to have written,
And such laurels invite as none yet have invitten.
Tom Nissed.

The man he was trying to smite then he smote,
The fire he was trying to light then he lote,
And the wrong he was longing to right then he rote.

The foe he was trying to fight then he fote,
The bread he was longing to bite then he bote,
And the ship he was trying to sight then he sote.

The foe he was trying to slight then he slote,
The man he was trying to spite then he spote,
And the hopes he was trying to blight then he blote.

The hat he was trying to dight then he dote,
The maid he was trying to fright then he frote,
And the pledge he was trying to plight then he plote.

BY TAKING CAPSULOIDS you will wear

Luxuriant Natural HAIR

BY TAKING IMITATIONS you will wear A WIG.

Imitation (in Capsuloids) is the most dishonest form of flattery.

Capsuloids, the first and only genuine hair cure, after curing many thousands, and thus securing a great reputation as the first real hair cure worthless so-called Tablets and Capsules for the hair, and Capsules said to contain Iron or some other stuff, and wrongly represented to be just the same as and just as good as Capsuloids, and of course, cheaper.

ARE IMITATED BY

If you can purchase an imitation which is just as good as Capsuloids, 6d. or 9d. cheaper, you would be foolish not to do so, but although the man who sells you the imitation because he makes a big profit out of it may urge upon you that it is just as good, your own common-sense should tell you that if the manufacturer of it had discovered a genuine hair cure, he would be selling it on its own merits, and not on our advertising.

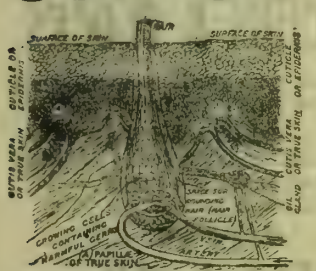
A GENUINE REMEDY IS NEVER SOLD AS AN IMITATION.
AN IMITATION IS NEVER A GENUINE REMEDY.

Imitations of Capsuloids generally cost a few farthings. Any analytical chemist will tell you that there are many preparations the secret of which he cannot discover even by analysis. No one has ever discovered how to make Capsuloids. The secret is known only to one member of this Company.

During all the thousands of years before the discovery of Capsuloids there was no hair cure. Now there is one, but only one genuine hair cure. Through the roots they cure FALLING OUT AND PREMATURELY GREY HAIR.

SO INSIST ON HAVING

CAPSULOIDS.



Look on this picture of a growing hair greatly magnified, showing the harmful germs at the root, and learn how and why Capsuloids must and do cure. You can understand it perfectly. Medical treatment is not a matter of miracles in these days, but it is instead a simple matter of science, and so of common-sense.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1572. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, February 13, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICES.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

An Index to the Sixtieth Volume of Truth will be forwarded, post-free, to any address on application to the Publishing Office, Bolt-court, Fleet-street, E.C. The half-yearly Volume can be obtained at the same address, price 25s.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE "ceremonial" at the opening of the new Central Criminal Court will be "semi-state," by command of the King. Their Majesties will drive from Buckingham Palace to the Old Bailey, with a military escort, by way of the Strand, and in Fleet-street the Royal procession is to be met by the Corporation, when the Lord Mayor will present the King with Queen Elizabeth's sword with the customary formalities. The proceedings at the Old Bailey will be very brief. The King is to declare the building open in the central hall, and after an address has been read by the Recorder, his Majesty will open the door of the principal court, using the inevitable gold key, which the Corporation will, of course, provide. The new Court has cost the City nearly £600,000.

On the nights of the Courts which the King and Queen are to hold in the Ballroom at Buckingham Palace (on the 22nd and on March 1), the garden entrance will be reserved exclusively for members of the Royal family, and when the Prince and Princess of Wales arrive there they are to be received by the Great Officers of the Household and the other White Staves, who will conduct them to the White Drawing-room, where the Royal procession to the ballroom will be formed.

The Corps Diplomatique, Ministers, and other personages entitled to the entrée will arrive at the Pimlico entrance, and are to be shown to the Bow Drawing-room, and thence to the ballroom, where the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission, with their wives, will be received by the Master of the Ceremonies and his assistants. The members of the Royal family (except the Prince and Princess of Wales) are to be received at the garden entrance by the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Household, and the Vice-Chamberlain, who will conduct them to the Council Room, and thence to the White Drawing-room. The Royal procession will be formed directly after the King and Queen enter the White Drawing-room, and will pass through the Bow Drawing-room, the Blue Drawing-room, and the State Dining-room, to the daïs in the ballroom. Their Majesties, the Princes and Princesses, and the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission and their wives will proceed after the Court to the Chinese Room for supper, which is to be announced to the King and Queen by the Lord Steward directly the presentations have been concluded. Supper will be served for the guests in the Green Drawing-room and another room at buffets.

The general company will arrive at the State entrance of the Palace, and will pass to the ballroom through the promenade gallery. After the reception of the Corps Diplomatique and the presentations from the Diplomatic Circle, the entrée company will be received by their Majesties, and then the general body of guests. At the Diplomatic and Official Court on the 22nd there will be a very small contingent of general company, but a very crowded entrée, and a full attendance of the Corps Diplomatique. The order as to costume at the Courts is "full dress-uniform."

The King's contemplated visit to Ireland will not take place in May, as was originally expected, as his Majesty has numerous engagements in England during that month. The visit of the King and Queen of Denmark to the Court will most likely take place about the middle of May, according to the latest arrangements, and it is now expected that their Majesties will stay for a week at Buckingham Palace, and that during the Whitsuntide holidays they will be the guests of the King and Queen either at Windsor Castle or at Sandringham. In this case the period of the State visit of King Frederick and Queen Louise will be limited to their stay in London, and during the remainder of their visit to England they will be the private guests of their Majesties.

LA MANIÈRE

(An Object Lesson to the British Tourist.)

In the streets of "gay Paree,"
Lo! they make a mighty stir,
Praising, each, with ardour free
"Edouard, roi d'Angleterre."

Nor they "Edouard" praise alone;
Alexandra, too, doth share
Popular affection's throne:
"Ah! la belle reine d'Angleterre."

E'en the gutter poets sing
Songs to greet both him and her;
Boulevards and alleys ring
With incessant "Angleterre."

"Mais ils ont la bonhomie,
Mais ils ont la manière,
Bien-venus à Paris,
Roi et reine, donc, d'Angleterre."

Oh, that Smith and Brown would take Lessons from the Royal pair.
Oh! that, when abroad, they 'd make
Study of "la manière."

If they did, then—truth to state—
These remarks would be more rare:
"Oh! ces Smeeth et Brown—ces bêtes!
Oh! ces cochons d'Angleterre!"

The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert was docked at Portsmouth last week for an overhaul and refit, and she is now berthed at the south railway jetty in the Harbour. The Victoria and Albert is expected to leave Portsmouth for the Mediterranean towards the end of March, and it is understood that she will embark the King at Marseilles early in the first week of April for a cruise to Naples, Athens, Corfu, and other ports. His Majesty will maintain a strict incognito during his cruise, and there will be no official receptions at any port which he visits.

Sir Stanley Clarke and Sir Arthur Davidson are to be the Equerries-in-waiting on the King during his Majesty's absence from England next month and in April, and they will be in attendance at Biarritz and during the King's subsequent yachting cruise in the Victoria and Albert.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are to give some dinner parties at Marlborough House during the next few weeks, and they will probably have a reception there before Easter.

The arrangements for the Royal visit to Devonport are now completed. The Prince and Princess of Wales will travel next Wednesday from Paddington to Plymouth, where they are to arrive at the Millbay Station at 4.30. The Royal train will pass over the new Great Western route to the West of England. The Prince and Princess, who are to be the guests of Sir Lewis and Lady Beaumont at the Admiralty House, Mount Wise, will drive on Thursday morning to the Royal William Yard, where they are to be received by the Lords of the Admiralty, and at 11.30 they will embark on board the Port Admiral's yacht Vivid. The yacht will proceed up the Hamoaze, and through the lock into the great basin of the North Extension, followed by the Admiralty yacht Enchantress.

The Prince and Princess will land for a short time at the West wall of the basin, and will be there received by Lord Fortescue (Lord Lieutenant of Devon), by the High Sheriff of the county, the Mayor of Devonport, and the naval and military authorities. After the opening ceremony the Prince and Princess will lunch on board the Enchantress. At three o'clock the Royal party will return on board the Vivid to the Royal William Yard, where they are to disembark.

On Friday morning, the 22nd, the Prince of Wales will inspect the Plymouth division of the Royal Marines. H.R.H. is to be accompanied by the Princess, and after the inspection they will drive to Millbay Station in order to leave Plymouth at 12.30 by the Great Western "Cornishman" express, which arrives at Paddington at 4.45. During their drives at Devonport and Plymouth the Prince and Princess of Wales will be attended by a travelling escort. After the dinner at Admiralty House on Thursday evening there will be a naval and military tattoo at Mount Wise.

The King and Queen of Norway and Princess Victoria are residing at the Royal Château of Woxenkollen, a few miles from Christiania, until March 2, when they will return to the capital. It is rumoured that the King and Queen of Norway will accompany the King and Queen of Denmark on their State visit to St. Petersburg about the middle of April, and that King Haakon will afterwards proceed to Vienna with his father to visit the Emperor Francis Joseph.

Last week was a busy one for Lord and Lady Aberdeen. In addition to their evening engagements, they had numerous ones to fulfil each day. On Monday afternoon they were present at the opening of the annual exhibition of the Royal Hibernian Academy, an institution which is not as flourishing as lovers of art in Ireland would wish it to be. It has lately, like most other things in the country, been inquired into by a commission, and a report has followed. The difficulty up to this time with regard to Irish commissions is to have anything else follow but a report. The period of "discovering" Ireland having passed, is now succeeded by one of inquiring into the "discovery." All Irish interest is at present absorbed in the consideration of what will succeed the inquiry period. What next, and when?

This week, when Lent commences, is a quiet one at Dublin Castle, a lull following the whirl of last week's festivities. Next week the second Levee and Drawing-room of the season will be held on the 19th inst., the Levee in the morning and the Drawing-room in the evening. In the beginning of March "The Irish Lace Ball" will be an important Viceregal entertainment. All ladies are to wear Irish lace or crochet-trimmed toilets. Special national dances are being arranged for the occasion by various ladies of Viceregal "light and leading." Another novelty introduced at Dublin Castle by Lord and Lady Aberdeen is afternoon tea parties, by means of which the more serious section of society can participate in Viceregal festivities. A successful entertainment of the kind was given last week by Lord and Lady Aberdeen to a large number of guests.

BILLINGTON-GREIG.—CONGRATULATIONS!

And so the girl, who Asquith's life
Once harried,
Has qualified to be a wife
And married.

Oh! may her heart henceforth enough
Be set in Domestic ties to stop her suff-Ragettin'!

By this inspiring hope elate,
I beg to Both Mrs. Greig congratulate
And Greig, too.

I shall be greatly disappointed if the psychical researchists and students of the occult do not make something very interesting out of the case of the nameless woman of Willesden, who believes that her husband has a double, and that the double has been filling his place for some time past. I suppose my readers have seen something of the Woman of Willesden in their daily papers. She first came to the front, like so many other people with strange troubles, by applying to a magistrate for advice. The case seemed to be beyond even a police-court Solomon. Since then she has confided in the press, and I read in my Daily Chronicle that she is quite convinced that her husband changed clothes with his double some time ago, and then disappeared. As both men took the same size in boots, smoked the same tobacco, and, most important of all, made the same weekly allowance for housekeeping, she did not notice the change at first; but doubts were engendered by the double's waist measurement and the colour of his hair. After the birth of her last child but one (she has five), she noticed that her husband's hair was darker than of yore. It does not seem to have occurred to her that the event had turned him grey, and that he might be having recourse to a restorer. But there may be something in this explanation, because it appears that after the appearance of the fifth child the man did not turn a hair.

Possibly, however, the true explanation of this case is to be found in the remarkable story told in the Contemporary Review this month, on the authority of Dr. Morton Prince, of Boston City Hospital, U.S.A. If the reader has not seen this story, I recommend him to peruse it without delay, for it is very wonderful, and I cannot possibly do justice to it here. It is the story of a lady patient of the Doctor's, who, as the result of a severe shock—complicated, I infer, by hypnotic treatment—"split up into three separate personalities." These three personalities seem to have been perpetually contending for the possession of the patient's body, like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. They gave the poor Doctor terrible trouble, as their characters and ideas were quite at variance, and one of them, who called herself Sally, was a most undesirable young person. If I understand the story aright, the Doctor effected some sort of partial cure, by fusing the other two, who thus combined were more than a match for Sally. But he has his doubts as to whether the mixture is "stable," and fears that his patient's personality may split up again with very slight provocation.

Now, what suggests itself to me is that the husband of the Woman of Willesden has split up just like the Lady of Boston. It may be that instead of changing clothes with a physical "double," as the wife supposes, what he did was to change bodies with a psychical double. So far as I understand the Contemporary article—and I am by no means sure that I understand it at all—we may any of us have sub-tenants in our bodies, who may take possession of the whole premises when we are out, and pose as the lawful owners, playing the very mischief with the tenement sometimes. Even if ejected, they are always on the look-out for an opportunity of slipping in again, and they find it when we are under the influence of hypnotism—or, I should imagine, drink. This is why I hope that the Willesden case will be investigated in a proper scientific spirit, like the one at Boston, U.S.A.

There is, however, another possibility which presents itself, and that is that it is the wife in the Willesden case who has "split up," and that her body is temporarily occupied by a sub-tenant who does not know the husband. It is even possible that something of the same kind may have happened in the Boston case—I mean, that it was the doctor, not the patient, who was "not quite himself." What I would suggest is that Dr. Prince should consult some other medical man about his own condition.

The Pall Mall Gazette informed the public last Thursday that the Duc d'Orléans "is getting pretty close to his quarantaine," adding to this interesting news the statement that he resides a great deal at Wood Norton, "the place in Worcestershire his father bought." The Comte de Paris did not buy Wood Norton, nor did he ever own that place. The estate was purchased by the late Duc d'Aumale, who left it to his grand-nephew, the Duc d'Orléans, with reversion to the Duc de Montpensier.

The past week has made for itself a melancholy record in the deaths of distinguished people. There have died within six days Lord Goschen, Sir Archibald Alison, Sir Godfrey Lushington, Sir William Henry Russell, and the Countess of Cadogan, all persons of light and leading in their days. And it is rather a coincidence that Sir Archibald Alison and Sir W. H. Russell, whose several professional careers both date from the Crimean War, should have died in the same week.

In purely intellectual qualities Lord Goschen was second to few statesmen of his time, and it was by sheer intellectual force that he made his position in Parliament. He had not only an accurate mind, capable of grasping every aspect and detail of a complicated subject, but his tastes and sympathies were wide, and he studied and understood many matters besides politics. In public life he was greatly handicapped by a poor and unpleasing voice, and also in some measure by shortness of sight. But he had a great gift of lucid speech, which seemed always at its best when the subject was dry and abstruse, as, for example, in his Budget speeches; he was always impressive, if not exactly eloquent; and he was a ready and formidable debater. As a practical man of business he made his mark in every administrative post that he filled—he was in harness, off and on, for five and thirty years—and as a sagacious adviser he was a tower of strength to every Ministry he joined.

In the palmy days of Mr. Gladstone's first Ministry there were Liberals who saw in Mr. Goschen, as he then was, a possible future leader of the party. Had he been born a generation earlier, he might have achieved such a position. But his opinions, which were very strong and never varied, were not the opinions of any party in his own time, though he could find enough in common with both Liberals and Conservatives to serve in Ministries on each side. He was essentially a Whig, and in the days when Whiggery was in the ascendant, he might have been a powerful Prime Minister. As it was, his political career was passed in a state of oscillation between the two parties of his day.

Six years before he openly seceded from Mr. Gladstone on the Home Rule Question, Mr. Goschen had practically severed himself from the Liberals over the county franchise question. He was the first of the seceders to take office on the other side, when Lord Randolph Churchill made the opening for him. He was also one of the first of the Unionist front bench men to declare against Mr. Chamberlain when that gentleman sought to lead the party back to protection. But in spite of these breaches with his colleagues, his political career was from first to last consistent and honourable. He never contradicted himself, nor even dissembled his opinions, and he never incurred, even from an opponent, the suspicion of manœuvring for his own advantage. For this he had his reward in the profound respect of all his contemporaries, including those who most strongly disagreed with him, and there is no one to-day who does not feel that the country has lost a man who has throughout his life rendered it honest and valuable service.

Lord Goschen was a man of keen literary and artistic tastes, which had been well cultivated ever since he left Rugby. His biography of his grandfather, the Leipsic publisher, is an excellent piece of literary work; his famous book "The Theory of Foreign Exchanges" passed through many large editions; and it is to be regretted that the pressure of public life prevented him from writing anything else, except a few articles and addresses. Probably no event in his life gave Lord Goschen more pleasure than his unanimous election to the Chancellorship of the University of Oxford, in the place of the late Lord Salisbury. He took a most hearty interest in all University affairs, and paid frequent private visits to Oxford. His attachment to Oriel was as devoted as that of Macaulay to Trinity College, Cambridge.

When Mr. Gladstone came into power in 1880 he was anxious that Mr. Goschen should replace the late Lord Lytton as Viceroy of India, but the proposal was declined. After Goschen had completed the work of his special mission to Constantinople he was requested by Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville to remain there as permanent Ambassador, but he refused. A year later the office of Secretary of War was offered to him by Mr. Gladstone, but he was not then desirous of returning to the Liberal Cabinet. Shortly afterwards the late Lord Hampden vacated the office of Speaker, for which Mr. Goschen would have been unanimously elected, but he refused to accept nomination owing to his defective eyesight, and Lord Peel was then chosen.

In Memoriam:

Viscount Goschen. Died February 7, 1907.

Those forty years of public life
Saw few men greater;
The devious ways of Party strife
Knew no man straighter.

His wisdom in affairs of State
By some was mooted;
But this one thing, at any rate,
Goes undisputed:

To duty all alike confess
His strict devotion,
And own that stands for uprightness
The name of Goschen.

Sir Archibald Alison was highly distinguished and conspicuously able both as a soldier and as an administrator, but the origin of his early professional success was a chance encounter with Sir Colin Campbell in the trenches before Sebastopol one night during the winter of 1854-55, when they were both out on duty. After a short conversation Sir Colin expressed a wish for some more talk with Alison (who was then under thirty), as he seemed "a sensible fellow." They met again several times, and later on Sir Colin was much impressed with a speech on military affairs which Alison delivered in the autumn of 1856 at a public dinner at Glasgow. The result was that when Sir Colin Campbell was ordered off to India in July, 1857, at the crisis of the Mutiny, he appointed Alison to be his military secretary. He was severely wounded at the relief of Lucknow, when he lost his right arm. Alison afterwards served in the Ashanti War (as Brigadier-General under Lord Wolseley), and in the Egyptian War of 1882, during which he commanded the Highland Brigade. He held a number of important staff appointments at home, his last post being the command at Aldershot.

Sir Archibald was the son of the historian, and he inherited his father's literary tastes. He was an excellent scholar, and had read enormously in every department of literature. He was a most popular officer throughout his career, and his death is regretted by all who knew him; but he has passed away full of years and honours. Sir Archibald's grandfather was one of the most eloquent preachers of the day, and widely celebrated as a scholar. If he had pushed himself, as was then the custom among ecclesiastics of ability, especially if backed by powerful interest, he would certainly have become a bishop. The famous Dugald Stewart said, after hearing Alison preach: "No man ever wrote a better sermon; no man ever spoke a better sermon; no man ever thought a better sermon."

Sir William Henry Russell perhaps gained a greater name than any journalist who has merely been a writer—for though for many years he owned and edited the Army and Navy Gazette, it is not in that connection that he was ever known to the public or will be remembered in his profession. It was as a correspondent of the Times that he became famous, and he achieved fame at a bound in the Crimean War, though, as a matter of fact, the work that he did in the Indian Mutiny and the American Civil War was in no respect inferior to his letters from the Crimea. The kind of success that he made by those letters is often ephemeral, and chiefly the creation of circumstances; but in Russell's case it was not so. He was a man of great natural literary gifts, keen observation, and thoroughly sound judgment, and he consequently shone both as a descriptive writer and a critic. His achievements are the more wonderful when it is remembered that he went out to the Crimea without a shred of military knowledge or experience. Nor is it less to his credit that he gained from the beginning of his career the complete confidence and affection of the Army; in fact he was regarded by all officers who knew him personally quite as a comrade in arms. He had an irresistibly winning way with him, and was popular everywhere, certainly not least among his brother journalists.

Lady Cadogan was a true grande dame of the old school, and one of the great hostesses of the highest English society. She was a woman of strong character, and of remarkable ability, and with an exceptional capacity for practical administrative business, as she proved during her residence in Ireland, where she was the life and soul of every description of good work. She was never fastidious or over exclusive, but was attentive and affable to every one, with a fine tact, and a most kindly and sympathetic manner. Lady Cadogan had long been one of the ornaments of society, and her loss will be deeply lamented by a host of friends who admired and esteemed her. As to her home life, she was the delight and comfort of her family, and entirely associated herself with their interests and pursuits. She was the staunchest of friends, never being uncertain or capricious. To the poor she was most generous and considerate, and she took a genuine interest in her neighbours of all classes, both in town and country. She was one of the most intimate friends of the King and Queen, who had the greatest regard for her. As a political hostess, she rendered valuable service to the Tory party for some years, and her reign in Dublin was a brilliant period in the history of the Viceregal Court. Lady Cadogan was a remarkably fine horsewoman, like all her sisters, the daughters of the second Earl of Craven.

Mr. F. A. Hamilton, who died last week in his ninety-third year, was for nearly forty years the senior partner in the well-known firm of Brown, Shipley, and Co. He took an active but unobtrusive part in extending the scope of the Bank Holiday Act, and he was a most munificent supporter of many hospitals and charities and of all the Evangelical societies. He was a partner in Brown, Shipley, and Co. from 1845 until 1903, when he retired.

Lord Thring was one of the most valuable public servants of the last century. His official career was one of great practical usefulness, but he never came much before the public. He was for eighteen years the first Parliamentary Counsel to the Government, and it was his duty to draft the principal Ministerial Bills. He was a man of great ability, and he delighted in his work. The last important measure which he drew was the Home Rule Bill of 1886. Lord Thring belonged to a distinguished family of brothers. They were the sons of a Somersetshire clergyman, and their mother was a sister of the well-known Dr. Jenkyns, who was Master of Balliol and Dean of Wells. Lord Thring married the sister of the late Lord Cardwell. He was a pupil of Dr. Butler at Shrewsbury, and went afterwards to Magdalene College, Cambridge, on which foundation he was a Fellow for many years.

Sir Charles Hughes Hunter, who died last week at Plas Coch, his place in the island of Anglesey, was for many years one of the most zealous leaders of the Liberal Party in North Wales, and he had taken an active share in every branch of county business. He was the son of Captain Hunter, of Glencarse, Perthshire, and assumed the name of Hughes in consequence of his having married the daughter and heiress of Mr. William Bulkeley Hughes, who sat in Parliament as Liberal member for the Carnarvon boroughs for over forty years. Sir Charles, who was created a baronet last year, was very popular in Anglesey, and his death is regretted by all classes and parties.

The question that I asked last week about the results of the great Hall-Caine-cum-Daily-Mail experiment in cheap book publishing has been answered from so many quarters that I think there can be no doubt why we have heard nothing about it from the experimenters themselves. I believe I am right in saying that this epoch-making work, which was to prove how much better Mr. Hall Caine and the Daily Mail understood the reading public than do the publishers and the book trade, has lately been offered to the trade in bulk at 1s. bound in cloth or 6d. in paper covers; and as far as I can learn, sales have not been brisk at those prices. In plain English, the publication was a huge fiasco, and the stock is unsaleable at rubbish prices. Remembering the huge advertisement with which the book was sent off, the experiment certainly has proved a good deal, though not precisely what author and publishers expected.

Trinity College, the Dublin University, has been prompt to roll the drum and unfurl the battle flag on the first threat to its ascendency privileges. For all that, it is interesting and possibly ominous that Professor Mahaffy, in a public lecture last week in Dublin, fell foul of the great Queen Bess, and called the foundress of Trinity College many hard names. Nothing succeeds like success, and in the same way, possibly, nothing fails like failure.

The Government may be congratulated upon a most excellent appointment to the Principalship of Glasgow University, and it is highly satisfactory to Scotch Liberals that a layman should have been selected for this important post. Dr. Macalister is a "strong" man all round, having remarkable force of character, with a really wonderful variety of acquirements in many departments of knowledge, and he is a very able organiser and administrator. He is a distinguished expert in medical and mathematical science. Since the death of Sir George Humphreys he has been the chief manager of the Cambridge Medical School. Dr. Macalister had a brilliant University career, and he was Senior Wrangler in 1877.

The large majority in favour of the reformers of the Mathematical Tripos at Cambridge is highly satisfactory, and the disappearance of the Senior Wrangler will be disturbing only to the silly and sentimental. All the three graces were carried without difficulty, and this result is an important triumph for educational reformers and also for the Cambridge residents, who really carry on the practical work of the University. The fact is that such a question should be decided by experts alone, and not by the general body of graduates. Mr. Balfour voted with the majority.

A canonry at Windsor will be placed at the disposal of the Prime Minister at the end of this month by the resignation of Lord Normanby, who was appointed to his stall in St. George's Chapel by Lord Salisbury in 1891. The canonry is worth £1,000 a year, with an excellent prebendal house in the Cloisters of Windsor Castle.

Lord Harrowby and the other trustees who are the patrons of the important living of Tiverton have presented Canon Roxby, who has been for more than eleven years Rector of Cheltenham. The rectory of Tiverton, which became vacant by the much regretted death of Prebendary Scott, is of the net value of about £800 a year, with house. The living had been declined by Prebendary Burroughs, Vicar of Plymouth, and by the Rev. W. H. Stone, the new Rector of Walcot, Bath, before it was offered to Canon Roxby.

I have received the following from one of my Roman Catholic readers:—

In commenting on the case heard before His Honour Judge Gye in the County Court at Portsmouth recently, in which a teacher sued the managers of St. Joseph's Roman Catholic school for salary in lieu of notice, you remark that the case has "an incidental bearing on the administrative methods of certain Roman Catholic Bishops." This will, I venture to think, be more apparent when it is realised that Canon Watson, the real defendant in the case, is a man of many parts; he is primarily priest in charge of the church at Gosport, and also at Ann's Hill on the outskirts of Gosport; to the duties belonging to these two missions he adds those of Military Chaplain, Chaplain to the Naval Hospital at Haslar, and also administrator of the Rescue Society for the diocese. These duties might by some people be thought to be enough for one man to attend to, but Canon Watson holds the further offices of Trustee for the Diocesan Schools, Manager of those at Gosport, Diocesan Inspector, and Secretary to the Portsmouth Diocesan Catholic Schools Associations; and lastly in the course of his examination in Court he pleaded that he was also the representative of the Bishop when he closed the school in question. He stated that he was not Zanoig when asked one pointed question, and this would seem to be about the only thing which he did not claim to be. It sounds like a passage from the "Mikado."

There is, however, one thing which Catholics must be ready to rejoice in as a result of the recent notices in Truth, and that is: for the first time in history, it was given out on Sunday how the money received for the orphans of the diocese had been apportioned. This is a very decided step in the right direction, and we can only hope that, as this improvement has begun, further steps in the same direction may be carried out, and that instead of forcing all the work on one man in future, it may be a little more fairly distributed, and that some little thing may be found for others to do. Perhaps even the Chancellor, or the Vicar-General, might be employed usefully, for though both of them appear in the Directory, no one seems ever to have heard of either of them being called upon to do anything in connection with his office.

Here is another letter on the subject of schools which is interesting from other points of view than the purely Catholic:—

Most sincerely do I trust that Catholics will refuse to confide one hundred thousand pounds to Archbishop Bourne, or any other sum, until, not only satisfactory explanation has been given, but due reparation has been made for the loss in Stock Exchange gambling of the Dawes Trust money.

Moreover, in any case, the money given for Catholic schools is money thrown into the sea.

At the meeting of the Catholic Trust Conference, held in Liverpool two or three years ago, it was publicly stated more than once in the presence of Bishops—Dr. Bourne amongst them—and priests that seventy-five per cent. of the children leaving Roman Catholic schools were utterly lost to the Faith, and that the remaining twenty-five per cent. were only held to it by the slenderest threads. Not one of the Bishops or priests contradicted or even disputed this fact. Our schools, then, as at present carried on, are an absolute failure, and raising money to bolster them up is little short of asking for money under false pretences. Some other system must be tried, and the Government, in its new educational measures, may treat Catholic schools as a negligible quantity. We must spend our money in looking after our children out of school hours; the expense will be less, and the result far more satisfactory.

I confess it rather surprises me to hear this, because I have always supposed—and it has been more than once said in Truth in connection with the question of religious education—that the Romanists manage to retain in the Church the greater number of the children who pass through their schools. The reason for this I have imagined to be that the priests keep an eye on the spiritual welfare of the children after they leave school, which is the time when any religious opinions worth having are formed. In the case of the Church of England, I doubt if it could be shown that even 25 per cent. of the children educated in Church schools grow up to be members of the Church in any practical sense. Notoriously, the vast majority of them are not communicants, rarely enter a church, and have only the haziest notions about the dogmas that they have been taught at school.

The inference that I have always drawn from the obvious facts in respect to the Churchmanship of the working classes—quite half of whom have been brought up on dogmatic theology in Church schools—is that what a child is taught before it is fourteen years of age has no perceptible effect on the religion that it will hold as an adult. The whole theory of Church schools is, in short, a vain delusion; and all the millions that Canon Cleworth claims as having been spent on them have been from the Church point of view absolutely wasted. The theory of Dr. Clifford and the Passive Resisters falls to the ground at the same time, for no Nonconformist need be troubled in his conscience that his rates are used to teach dogmas of which he disapproves, when it is quite certain that the dogmas, if ever learnt at all, will be wholly forgotten by the time the pupil's beard has grown.

With reference to what was said in Truth a fortnight ago respecting the typewriting examinations of the Society of Arts and the National Union of Teachers, I have received a letter from the chairman and secretary of the N.U.T. Examinations Board stating that while it is quite true that the headmaster of the typewriting department at the City of London College is the examiner, "no students of this college have ever been entered for the typewriting examinations of the National Union of Teachers." This is satisfactory, so far as it goes, but it would have been much more so had it been stated that no students of the College ever will be entered for the examinations. It ought to be clearly understood that an examiner has no interest, direct or indirect, in the result of an examination, and the only way to satisfy everybody concerned that this is so is to exclude from the examination all pupils in whom the examiner may possibly be interested. As the attention of the examining bodies has been called to this particular point, I hope that it may also have been directed to the other points in regard to which the examinations have incurred criticism.

I have to acknowledge the following contributions towards the Toy Fund:—Mrs. P. Keely, 10s.; Lieut. J. A. Edgell, H.M.S. Merlin, £2 15s.; F. Pollock, £5; G. N. D., £5; In Memoriam, M. L. L., £5. Mr. William Gillett has forwarded me £5 towards a fund for the Homeless and Destitute.

The action of Mr. Warmington against Colonel Wallace seems to me to concern Mr. Haldane as much as anybody else. Colonel Wallace commanded the King's Colonials. The finances of the corps were in a bad way; and money was wanted for a drill hall and other purposes; and the Colonel, like many other commanding officers of Volunteers and Yeomanry, did not see where to get it. But an idea occurred to him; he consulted Mr. Warmington; and the upshot of it was that Mr. Horlick was induced to put down £5,000 on the understanding that his name would be submitted to the Prince of Wales, as Colonel-in-Chief of the regiment, for consideration as a person deserving of honour. Mr. Horlick was not represented or present at the trial of the action, and one does not want to do him any injustice; but the foregoing account of the transaction seems to have been practically admitted by all parties concerned, and I suppose it cannot be seriously disputed.

This method of obtaining money for any public purpose is open to observation from more than one point of view, but, raised under these particular circumstances, the most obvious point of view is that of Volunteer corps generally. That is why the case seems to concern the Secretary of State for War. Surely it is not a sound principle to leave any branch of the Army to be financed by such means. Yet what are commanding officers to do? They must get money by hook or by crook.

That a civilian should subscribe money to a Volunteer corps in the hope of obtaining some sort of a handle to his name from the "fountain of honour" is perhaps exceptional. But what is much more common, and much more important, is that an officer may provide for the requirements of the corps out of his own pocket, and obtain thereby, not only a handle to his name, but promotion and military command. It is the inevitable result of the present state of things that the command of a Volunteer or Yeomanry regiment may depend upon the ability or willingness of an officer to spend his money on the regiment. Between this and purchasing a colonelcy there is little or no difference. When the Army was being reformed by Mr. Cardwell, the abolition of purchase was considered to be an essential step in the process, and no one at the present moment will dispute that it was a right and necessary step, or that it has been for the benefit of the Army as a military machine. It is not a bit less necessary to the efficiency of the Auxiliary Forces that "purchase," direct or indirect, should be abolished there also. But this can never be effected unless all money necessary for the efficient administration of each regiment is provided from public sources.

Writing with reference to the case of Warmington v. Wallace a correspondent says:—

The Lord Chief Justice said yesterday that all would regret "this idea of trafficking in honours which were intended, and only given, as a reward for meritorious services." The prime reason why a properly managed monarchy can attract to the public service a class of men which no republic has ever yet obtained, and which makes the great difference between honest and dishonest government, is the wonderful attraction of "honours." You know how men will devote their wealth, their energy, their time, and even risk their lives, and be quite happy at the end of it all with a little piece of paper conferring some title or recognition. I have sometimes fancied that you are inclined to underrate the value to the State of such things. But we must all agree, I think, that when once the "honour" becomes a dishonour we shall be immediately on the road to the state of things prevailing in certain republics, where it is notorious that no gentleman will identify himself with the politics of his country on account of the bribery and dishonourable practices which open the road to promotion.

What I have complained of in regard to the distribution of "honours" is that, instead of being conferred for public services, they are largely conferred for services to parties and individuals; and these services generally take the form of putting down a certain sum in cash. Everybody knows that titles, and even seats in the House of Lords, are nowadays marketable commodities. There have been notorious instances of it in recent promotions to the peerage, and even the sums paid in one or two instances have become known. It is quite true that men can serve the State with their money as well as with their brains or their arms and legs. I would not, therefore, say that a man who places his purse at the disposal of the State should not receive his "honour" as much as the statesman or the soldier. What I object to is that the money in respect of which the honours are dispensed should go into a party war fund, or into certain individual pockets. I want the thing put on a business footing. The State gets the services for which a general receives a peerage. It would even get the benefit of a payment of £5,000 to the fund of a Volunteer corps. But it gets no benefit whatever from the payment of £100,000 to the Carlton Club.

If London ratepayers would read the reports of the London County Council proceedings, and neglect all the electioneering literature, and speeches, with which they are at present inundated, their chances of giving their votes wisely at the next election would be improved. Each sitting of the Council seems to disperse one or two useful electioneering fictions. Last week there was an interesting discussion on what has figured in the press as the "Blankets Scandal." I had gathered from some of my morning and evening Conservative contemporaries that one of the achievements of the Progressive majority had been to saddle the London ratepayers with a huge accumulation of Austrian blankets, apparently for no purpose but that of expending the ratepayers' money for the benefit of wicked foreigners. I forget how many thousands of these useless blankets were alleged to have been purchased, but the transaction was represented as a repetition of the bargain of Moses Primrose over the spectacles.

The truth of this matter, as revealed at the last sitting of the Council is (1) that by a mistake in the office, which might occur in any house of business, and for which no one on the Council can possibly be held responsible, an order was given for 720 blankets in excess of the number intended; (2) that these blankets are "Austrian" blankets made in Yorkshire, the name being merely a trade description; (3) that owing to the rise in the price of wool the accident is likely to be financially profitable, the Council having simply bought a little surplus stock in a rising market. This is a fair sample of dozens of malicious fictions with which the London electors are now being fooled every day. A Moderate alderman of the Council denounced the propagation of this particular fiction, remarking that "it was quite unworthy of those who advocate Moderate interests to make capital out of a mistake of this character." This only shows what I said the other day, that the Moderates on the Council have greater cause than anybody else to complain of the Moderates outside it.

A description in the Animals' Friend of the manner in which pigeons are brought over from Italy to the London market is unpleasant reading, especially for those who are in the habit of eating the birds. During the journey, which occupies nearly three days, the pigeons are closely packed in crates, and only once fed. The feeding takes place when they reach Paris. By that time a number are dead. These are removed, and the survivors are fed—the birds being too young to feed themselves—"by men taking soft food into the mouth, opening the beak, and blowing it into the gullet." A a day or so later, pigeons, which are imported at the rate of 8,000 to 10,000 a week, are served up as dainty dishes for our consumption. After this I imagine that many people will cease to eat pigeons in any form unless assured that the birds do not come from Italy.

THE AGE TO MARRY.

"What's the proper age to marry?"
Thus a paper, "stuck" for news,
Asks; nor do its readers tarry,
One and all, to air their views.

Bee, a beauty young and bouncing
(Born in 'eighty-eight) is seen
Proper age, for girls, pronouncing
When they 've just attained eighteen.

Clara, she some eight years older,
Doth the age for wedlock fix
(So a little bird has told her)
When a girl 's turned twenty-six.

Mary, who in 'sixty-nine O
First beheld the light of Heaven,
Most emphatic doth assign O
Marriage age as thirty-seven.

Carrie, she a widow seasoned—
Born I cannot quite say when—
Proper age, in words well-reasoned,
Proves to be two-score-and-ten.

Which is right? or Clara, Carrie,
Mary, or the bouncing Bee?
What 's the proper age to marry,
Since the four thus disagree?

And I answer, of the views I 've
Mentioned, all are right, yet wrong;
For to no one age exclusive
Doth the marriage time belong.

This, in short, the course most sage is,
This the woman's wisest plan,
Let her wed, whate'er her age is,
When she meets the "willin'" man.

I see from the Birmingham Post that the Lord Chancellor has written to several of the magistrates of the borough of Kidderminster who have not been regular in their attendance on the Bench, intimating that unless he hears from them within a fortnight that they desire to remain on the Commission of the Peace their names will be removed. I congratulate the Lord Chancellor on taking action in the direction of a reform which has long been advocated in Truth. All over the country the Commission of the Peace has been overloaded with the names of persons whose one object in obtaining the right to place J.P. after their names is to obtain thereby a certain amount of social distinction, and who make no endeavour to fulfil their duties as magistrates. Perhaps under ordinary circumstances their neglect of their duties is not altogether to the disadvantage of the community, but the retention of these drones in the magisterial hive naturally operates in the direction of preventing the appointment of new magistrates. Besides, they form a class from which it is quite possible, when a case in which special interests are involved arises, to secure a majority which shall over-ride the decisions of their more competent and regular occupants of the Bench.

From the report of a case in the Times last week it seems that the President of the Probate Division prefers the form of oath for witnesses as administered in the Scotch courts to that used in the English courts. This is, I think, a sensible and praiseworthy preference, but in connection with the report in question a legal correspondent calls my attention to an interesting point. Section 5 of the Oaths Acts, 1888, provides that

> If any person to whom an oath is administered desires to swear with uplifted hand in the form and manner in which the oath is usually administered in Scotland, he shall be permitted to do so, and the oath shall be administered to him in such form and manner without further question.

The "form" of the Scotch oath is, "I swear by Almighty God, as I shall answer at the great Day of Judgment, that the evidence I shall give shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth;" and the "manner" is that the presiding judge, standing, administers the oath to the witness, who, holding up his right hand, repeats the words after the judge. In the English courts in most cases the oath in what is supposed to be the Scotch "form and manner" is administered by an officer of the court—not by the judge—and from the report of the case in the Probate Division it would appear that the words used are not quite the same as those used in Scotland.

The question my correspondent raises is this: Could a witness to whom the oath has been administered in this way and who has sworn falsely be convicted of perjury, seeing that the oath was not duly administered to him according to the provisions of the statute? The expression "form and manner" certainly seems to require that the presiding judge shall personally administer the oath to the witness, as in Scotland, and that the words shall also be the same as those used in Scotland. To do this would give trouble to his Majesty's judges and others, and that may be the reason why the Scotch "form and manner" are not followed here. But to set at rest any doubt in the matter, it is desirable that an order should be issued as to how the oath in the Scotch form is to be administered, or that, if necessary, a short Act should be passed declaring fully how it is to be done. For my own part I am strongly in favour of the adoption of the Scotch form in English courts, and I am glad to find that the use of it here is increasing. It is much more solemn and impressive, as well as more cleanly and wholesome than the English "S'help-me-God-kiss-the-Book."

The situation of Bristol in an agricultural and dairy district ought to ensure it an exceptionally good milk supply, but according to a recent statement of the chairman of the City Bench the supply is exceptionally bad. The statement was based on the number of prosecutions for adulteration. This attack on the trade has evoked a protest from the Bristol Milk Vendors' Association which is certainly not at all milk-and-watery. In a pamphlet on the subject, which I have received from the Association, it seems to be argued, in effect, that in Bristol the milk-sellers are the victims of what is really a species of persecution at the hands of over-zealous officials, ignorant of the fact—recognised by the Board of Agriculture—that under certain circumstances and at certain seasons of the year milk, though perfectly pure, may nevertheless fall below the standard laid down by the Food and Drugs Act. In other words, the cow, not the dairyman, may be to blame. Cases of injustice of this kind do undoubtedly occur, though whether it is such prosecutions which have helped to give the trade in Bristol an undeservedly evil reputation it is, of course, impossible for me to say.

A cruel and preposterous proceeding on the part of the overseers of the parish of Newnham, Kent, came before the Faversham County Bench last week, when a widow named Mann, living at Newnham, was summoned for the non-payment of poor-rate amounting to 5s. The woman is a pauper receiving 5s. 6d. a week as out-relief from the Romney Union, and out of this income, with the addition of half-a-crown or three shillings a week that she is able to earn, she has to pay the rent of her cottage and maintain herself and four children. The magistrates, recognising the hardship of expecting a person in her position to pay the poor-rate, had adjourned the summons at the previous sessions so that the matter could be brought before the overseers of Newnham. Last week, however, the collector reported that the overseers would not consent to an order excusing the widow from payment of the rate, and, as payment cannot be excused without their consent, the Bench had no alternative but to make an order for payment. I am glad to learn that a gentleman in the neighbourhood has already undertaken to pay the rate for this poor woman, whose goods would otherwise be distrained upon. But the fact that the money has been found does not make any the less odious the conduct of the Bumbles of Newnham who thus seek to compel a pauper to contribute to the maintenance of the poor.

An application was made to the Bolton County Licensing Justices last week for a billiard licence for a temperance hall at Farnworth. It was urged that the provision of this means of amusement, apart from drinking facilities, would be a useful step in the direction of practical temperance policy. But the superintendent of police raised the extraordinary objection that there was plenty of accommodation in Farnworth for billiards at the public-houses, where the players could have their drink at the same time! He also suggested that billiards at such a place as the temperance hall, where only non-intoxicating drinks could be obtained, would be "dangerous, unless under very strict control." One could understand a publican putting forward such a view of the matter, but it is amazing to hear this objection from a police officer, and still more amazing to find that the Justices were so much impressed by it that they refused the licence.

Mr. Justice Joyce's decision last week in the case of Terry v. Paddington is peculiarly interesting in view of the references I have frequently made to the so-called "competitions" in connection with the results of football matches which are carried on by various parties operating from Holland. Terry carries on a business of this description, and Paddington claimed to have won certain prizes, which had not been paid over to him. He had threatened that unless he was paid he would publish certain statements, and Terry applied for an injunction to restrain him from doing so, the said statements being calculated to damage him in his business. In declining to grant an injunction Mr. Justice Joyce remarked:—

> The defendant in his letters complained that he had not got his prizes, and that he meant to have his rights. He said in effect "unless you settle with me I shall expose you." Suppose what he said—that he had been swindled—was true, why should he be stopped?

Why, indeed? Terry would have been better advised to "lay low and say nothin'" instead of appealing to the Court of Chancery.

In the case of some railway luggage thieves at Clerkenwell Sessions last week the jury asked the chairman, Mr. Loveland, K.C., to take serious notice of the conduct of two pawnbrokers' assistants, who accepted the stolen goods in pledge and failed to communicate with the police when the articles were described in the list of stolen goods which is daily furnished to pawnbrokers. Mr. Loveland commented severely on the conduct of the assistants and disallowed their expenses—an indirect penalty which in the circumstances was scarcely adequate. I believe that pawnbrokers as a body carry on their business fairly and honestly. But a number of them undoubtedly exhibit a good deal of laxity—to put it mildly—in taking in pledge goods offered under circumstances that ought to arouse suspicion, and here and there one hears of a pawnbroker who is really nothing better than a "fence." Practices of this kind need to be sharply suppressed, and the majority of pawnbrokers would, I have no doubt, welcome the expulsion of the black sheep from the trade.

The most noteworthy feature of my Legal Pillory this week is afforded by the case heard at Llandaff, where two worthy Colonels, a Member of Parliament, and a high educational functionary sat solemnly in judgment on a small boy accused of putting his arm round a little girl's neck and asking her for a kiss. Needless to say the ludicrous nature of the proceedings did not present itself to the Solons of Llandaff, and with becoming gravity they vindicated the outraged majesty of the law by fining the amatory boy ten shillings, or in default sentencing him to five days' imprisonment. Otherwise my Pillory is chiefly remarkable for its illustration of the leniency with which magistrates in various parts of the country have thought fit to extend to perpetrators of cruelty to animals. They are apparently unable to understand that a fine is no deterrent to the farmer who allows his horses to starve, or to the dealer who works a suffering animal until it drops dead by the roadside.

Govan Police-court. Before Bailie M'Farlane. Alexander M'Laren, charged with assaulting a woman in delicate health, from whose house he removed some furniture which had been purchased on the hire system. When she claimed some articles of her property he pulled her about and threw her to the floor. Fined 7s. 6d.

Ayr Police-court. Before Bailie Ferguson. Colin Munro, charged with assaulting Mrs. Kennedy by striking her in the face and knocking two of her teeth out. Fined 20s.

Clydebank Police-court. Before Bailie Cornock. John M'Whinnie, charged with assaulting a man who interfered with him when molesting a girl. The complainant was struck several times on the head and face, and knocked down. Fined 30s.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Leslie. John Conway, charged with assaulting Sarah Boyle by throwing her down and also assaulting Bernard Quinn by knocking him about and scratching his face Fined 21s.

Oswestry County Police-court. Frederick Lewis, a grocer, charged with unprovoked assault on George Lloyd and Owen Lloyd. He threw George Lloyd to the ground and kicked him in the eye. He upset Owen Lloyd, who passed him on a bicycyle, and brutally kicked him while on the ground. Fine and costs in both cases £6 6s. 6d.

Watton Petty Sessions. Robert Childerhouse, dealer, charged with cruelty to a pony by driving, travelling, and abandoning it while in an unfit state. When the animal could go no further he left it by the roadside, where it died. Fined £3 and costs.

Llandaff Petty Sessions. Before Colonel Woods, Colonel Fisher, Mr. Sydney Robinson, M.P., and Principal Griffiths. George Vincent, aged fourteen, charged with assaulting Margery Ellen Wightwick. On her way home from school he caught hold of her, put his arm round her neck, and asked her to give him a kiss. Fined 10s. and costs or five days' imprisonment.

Malmesbury Petty Sessions. Before Sir Richard Pollen, Col. Miles, Col. Turner, and other magistrates. Arthur Neal, in default of paying a fine of £2 and 9s. costs for carrying a gun without a licence. One month.

Helensburgh Police-court. Before Bailie Kidston. Mary Dunning, charged with stealing a skirt and blouse belonging to her daughter, sixty days' imprisonment. On leaving the dock the prisoner used some threatening language, whereupon the magistrate called her back and sentenced her to a further twenty-one days.

Reading Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. Ridley, Webb, Jackson, and Steward-Smith. William Jones, charged with stealing a coat and cap, value 20s. He took them from a greenhouse, where they had been left hanging up. One month's hard labour.

Oswestry Country Police-court. Before Captain Lovett and other magistrates. Robert Denton Holland, charged with driving a motor car to the danger of the public. The car frightened a pony so that it "nearly" bolted. Fined £10, £1 18s. 6d. costs, and licence endorsed.

Shepton Mallet Petty Sessions. Alfred Hall, charged with stealing a fowl and hoe, value 3s. 6d., from his employer, and George Robbins, charged with receiving them. Hill admitted the offence and selling the things to Robbins. Hill two months' hard labour, Robbins fined £1.

Liverpool City Police-court. Before Alderman Burgess, Dr. Richardson, and Mr. J. Thompson. T. Beazley and W. Hamilton, charged with ill-treating a donkey. The donkey was so emaciated that it could only stand by leaning against a wall. Beazley was beating the animal, and when it fell kicked it. Fined 20s. each and costs.

Fareham Petty Sessions. Frederick Elson, charged with cruelty to a horse by working it in an unfit state, and his employer, B. R. Turner, charged with causing it to be worked. The animal was lame, and its back, according to a witness, was "absolutely rotten" with sores. Turner fined £1 and costs, Elson 10s. and costs.

Methwold Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. H. P. Mack, and T. C. Frost and Rev. H. C. Hart. Frederick H. Rickard, farmer, charged with cruelty to five horses by failing to provide them with proper food and shelter. They were left in a snow-covered field without any food, and the dykes being frozen the animals could get no water. Fined £1 and costs.

King's Heath Police-court. Before Messrs. C. P. Lane and S. E. Johnson. Joseph Lambert, charged with stealing an outfit of clothing from the King's Norton Union. He said the workhouse people would not let him have his own clothes to go out in. Two months' hard labour.

Wymondham Petty Sessions. Before Mr. Stafford H. Jerningham and other magistrates. Harry Elvin, charged with stealing a live fowl, value 2s. 6d., and with receiving a live fowl, the property of a person unknown. He had been a fortnight in prison under remand, and the magistrates ordered him back to prison for another fortnight.

Paignton Police-court. Before Mr. G. Prestige and Capt. Hodge. Olive Banks, domestic servant, charged with stealing two silver watches and a silver chain from her employer. When charged she said, "Serve him right, he should have given me more money." One month.

Paignton Police-court. Henry Milton, a youth, charged with sleeping in a hay loft. Fourteen days.

Reference was made in TRUTH the other day to a trick advertisement in which a lady's hat was to be "given away" by some people calling themselves "Osborn and Dawson, French milliners," of 41, King William-street, E.C. I remarked at the time that this is not exactly the neighbourhood in which one would usually look for French millinery, and the same reflection seems to have occurred to the Financial News, with the results recorded in the following paragraph:—

> As the existence of the millinery business in King William-street had never revealed itself to us during the period—now nearly a quarter of a century—throughout which the offices of The Financial News have been in that locality, a representative of this journal went in search of Messrs. Osborn and Dawson. His journey, however, ended on the fourth floor at No. 41, where a door heavily padlocked on the outside effectually forbade further exploration. As the hour of his call was the early afternoon, it seems curious that the door should be fastened in that ponderous fashion (and from the outside, too) just at the time of day when ladies might be expected to call, on the purchase of millinery bent.

As I have already said, the advertisement is on the face of it one which no newspaper would publish if it understood its duty to its readers properly, and after the above evidence even a newspaper manager can hardly affect ignorance of its true nature.

My old friend Reuben May has broken out during the last week or two with an appeal distributed by post on a big illustrated card. Writing on January 25 he states that "since Saturday morning last, January 19, quite 10,000 extreme distressed persons, including many women and children, have had a portion of food at this mission." He states that "over 1,000" were relieved on Sunday. But as a matter of arithmetic, it will be seen that about 1,500 must have been relieved on every one of the seven days to make up his total, even if his statement, dated Friday, was made up after Friday's work was done. As May keeps open house for a short time daily, and plenty of people look in there for a bit of bread or whatever it may be, he, no doubt, "relieves" a good many hundred people during the week; but that he deals with anything like the figures above mentioned I do not believe. They are merely imaginary totals put down to attract sympathy, without any honest attempt to state true facts.

The following kind invitation, neatly printed on a white card from a copper-plate engraving, is being widely distributed:—

> At Home

This is the latest mode of asking the innocent fly to walk into the parlour of the bloodsucking spider. Really Mr. L. Fortescue is Mr. Abraham Cohen. By turning over the card you will see that Cohen, alias Fortescue, describes himself as "a private banker." This sounds nicer than "a usurer's tout," but I believe that the latter description would have the merit of being more accurate.

"Charles Bloomfield and Co." are the latest recruits to the ranks of the betting agents whose illegal businesses are carried on—or purport to be carried on—from offices at The Hague or elsewhere on the Continent. They have made a start with what is described as a great prize scheme (otherwise a sweepstake) on the Waterloo Cup, which under English law renders them liable to heavy penalties. Remittances for "shares" in this gamble have to be sent to The Hague, but in a reprint of an alleged newspaper puff which is enclosed with the prospectus it is stated that "Mr. Charles Bloomfield" has also a London office at 17, Woodstock-street, New Bond-street. That statement, which is borne out by the directory, appears to me to merit the attention of the authorities at Scotland Yard.

It has become an increasingly common practice for bookmakers and self-styled turf accountants whose headquarters are in London to set the law at defiance by doing business on the deposit system, besides promoting sweepstakes and so-called racing competitions, under the cover of Continental offices, which are often nothing more than accommodation addresses. Apparently it is supposed that this stratagem protects them from the consequences of their illegal acts. But is the law really so impotent? The question is not one on which I am qualified to pronounce an opinion, but I have been told that if the police set to work in the right way the offenders could be brought to book. It is at any rate a manifest absurdity that a man residing and carrying on a business in London should at the same time be allowed to conduct an unlawful branch of that business from an office in Holland; and if it be a fact that the Betting Act and the Lottery Acts can be circumvented by this device, the sooner those Acts are amended the better.

There would, of course, still remain to be dealt with the cases in which the Acts are violated by the horde of betting agents and lottery touts—some of them downright swindlers—whose operations are really and wholly conducted from places abroad. Here it is obviously the duty of the Post Office to obtain power to intercept letters and remittances addressed to such persons, just as the United States Post Office does. It seems to me that unless this course is adopted the Betting Acts and the Lottery Acts might almost as well be repealed. What, indeed, is the use of prohibiting various forms of gambling in England on the ground that they constitute a public evil, if the same evil is to be permitted to flourish—as it does to an ever-increasing extent—through the service of the Post Office?

I have had a good deal of correspondence from bank clerks with reference to the recent paragraphs in Truth on the question of banking hours. Many of the letters are rather melancholy reading, but I do not know how the position of bank clerks is to be improved until they organise themselves for the purpose of improving it as workers in other fields of employment have done. One gentleman fears that my suggestion that "the remedy lies in the hands of the aggrieved" is, "for obvious reasons, inapplicable to bank clerks." I can only say that the reasons are not obvious to me. I know of no reason which makes it more difficult for bank clerks to organise themselves and fight their own battles than for the servants of railway companies or colliery proprietors, unless it is that they have absurd social prejudices which forbid them to regard themselves as working men, or that they are too apathetic to stir hand or foot on their own behalf. If for this reason organisation is impossible in this field of labour, then it is no use discussing the question. Bank clerks are welcome to sympathy from the outside world, if that affords them any comfort, but the outside world can offer nothing else.

As regards the general question whether the present banking hours are the most convenient to the requirements of the community at large, I am told that some years ago a movement was set on foot to bring about the opening of banks at 10 a.m. instead of 9 a.m., but the movement failed. Why it failed, I do not know. I do not often have occasion to go into a bank before 10 a.m. myself, and I should say that the same thing is true of the vast majority of business people in London, as it certainly is of private customers. On the other hand, it is pretty certain that it would be a convenience to very large numbers of people to have their banks open until 5 p.m. The present banking hours certainly date from a period when general business hours were much earlier at both ends than they are at present. The bulk of the business of London begins quite an hour later than it did forty or fifty years ago, and in a great many businesses people work much later in the evening.

It is very public-spirited of Sir James Knowles to reprint for the benefit of the present generation 136 pages of opinions adverse to the Channel Tunnel project which he published in 1883; but I am not sure that the money it must have cost him has been well spent. The principal thing he has shown is that the opinions against the tunnel which are current to-day are practically identical with those of which we heard so much five-and-twenty years ago. Whether they are right or wrong, everybody must still judge for himself, and will probably judge, as before, more by prejudice than reason.

I have been particularly struck by the Nineteenth Century reprint of Lord Wolseley's arguments, because they show in a remarkable way what I was saying only the other day, namely, that our soldiers are the most modest of men and the most distrustful of their own abilities. Lord Wolseley was of opinion, as I suppose many of his successors are to-day, that however strongly you might fortify the British end of the tunnel, a handful of Frenchmen could walk into the defences on a dark evening, surprise the guard, and obtain possession of all the defensive works before anybody on the spot, still less anybody at a distance, knew what they were up to. He thinks it quite possible that a train-load of innocent-looking civilian tourists might descend from a French train at Dover, and carry out this design. He goes further than that, for he thought in 1882 that we could surprise and capture any French fortress in the same way. I suppose, therefore, that we must take it that he, or at any rate his successors, are of opinion that any of the strongholds on either side of the Franco-German frontier might to-day be as easily captured by an enemy from the other side, disguised as tourists or commercial travellers. It is no use arguing against such an opinion as this. It is not addressed to the intelligence.

Dover, Calais, and Boulogne have announced, I see, that they are opposed to a Channel Tunnel. Naturally they are, for the same reason that the proprietor of the refreshment room at Swindon objected to any train passing that station without being delayed there for ten minutes. Calais and Boulogne are frank. They put their opposition on the ground of local interests. Dover, however, puts hers on the interests of the country.

For my part I do not consider the danger of an invasion through the tunnel within the area of practical possibilities. If there had been a tunnel when Napoleon had collected a great army at Boulogne to invade us I doubt whether he would ever have endeavoured to use it. That there will some day be a tunnel I am certain, and then people will be surprised that this narrow passage under the sea, with its exit in an English fortress, and the means of turning the sea into it always ready to hand, ever was dreamt of as destroying our insularity.

Attempts to define party principles—in this country, at any rate—are generally amusing, but rarely useful for any other purpose. Sir John Gorst objects to Lord Rosebery's description of Lord Randolph Churchill's Tory-Democracy as "an imposture," or "the wolf of Radicalism in the sheepskin of Toryism;" and by way of reply he endeavours to explain exactly what it really meant. This is the explanation:—

> The principle of Tory Democracy is that all government exists solely for the good of the governed; that Church and King, Lords and Commons, and all other public institutions are to be maintained so far, and so far only, as they promote the happiness and welfare of the common people; that all who are entrusted with any public function are trustees, not for their own class, but for the nation at large; and that the mass of the people may be trusted so to use electoral power, which should be freely conceded to them, as to support those who are promoting their interests. It is Democratic because the welfare of the people is its supreme end; it is Tory because the institutions of the country are the means by which the end is to be attained.

How does this differ from democracy without any qualifying prefix? What is there in it that any Radical would not subscribe to? All democrats hold that government exists solely for the good of the governed—and most aristocrats and autocrats as well. No democrat desires to destroy any of the institutions of the country for the sake of destroying them. The contrary may be said, and possibly believed sincerely, but it has no truth in it. The most revolutionary spirit would only destroy or modify an existing institution because he considers that it does not "promote the happiness and welfare of the common people." Every democratic measure that has ever been carried, whether by Radicals or Tories, has used the institutions of the country as "the means by which the end is to be attained," even though it may have reformed those institutions by the principles of Tory Democracy as above expounded. It is absurd, therefore, to say that any form of democracy is "Tory" because the institutions of the country are the means by which the end is attained.

Lord Randolph Churchill was at heart a Radical, and I suspect Sir John Gorst of the same virtue—a suspicion shared by many of his own party. Tory-Democracy was a meaningless phrase, designed to enable a man to call himself a Tory, while holding and avowing convictions which had nothing in common with Toryism. Such a phrase cannot possibly express any intelligible principle. You might as well talk about Nonconformist-Churchmanship, or Atheistic-Catholicism, or White-Negrodom. In Lord Randolph Churchill's case, when the individual necessity which gave rise to the phrase disappeared, with the inventor, Tory-Democracy perished too. Sir John Gorst's pathetic lament that Toryism perished at the same time is obviously begotten only of undue tenderness for the departed. It is highly creditable to him, but I fear it says more for his heart than his head.

I happened to have a conversation with the late Mr. Gladstone in regard to the Lords after he had declared in the House of Commons that the present state of things could not go on. "Why," he asked, "do not you, and those who agree with you, get up a fund of £100,000, and enter into a serious agitation against them? This was what Cobden did when he carried Free Trade." I asked him what he would suggest as a substitute for the House of Lords. He replied, "Agitate for a suspensory veto only, and in doing so, remember this: never consent to a veto beyond a sessional one. It would be impossible under a longer term that any Liberal Administration could retain office, for it would either have to dissolve, or attempt to carry on the Government under such conditions that it would lose all hold on the country."

This, I think, was sound advice. If the Upper Chamber had only a suspensory sessional veto, its influence would depend upon its composition. All intelligent Peers would—and fairly—claim the right to surrender their privilege, and to be eligible for the House of Commons. In order to give the Upper Chamber such influence as it would secure by being an assembly of men of light and leading, the Conservatives would themselves be the first to demand that it should be composed of men whose opinions, when expressed, would carry weight.

The Government will make a mistake if it allows the House of Lords question to be fought on some particular Bill which the Lords have either vetoed or emasculated. The House of Commons should be invited to decide the general question whether an assembly of hereditary legislators and bishops of the Church of England—almost all of whom are Conservatives—should possess the present power of the Lords. I do not even see that an appeal to the country would be necessary, provided that a Bill embodying this reform were carried in the Commons by a large majority, for the decision at a General Election would be a foregone conclusion, unless Liberals and Radicals are prepared to accept political servitude permanently. I doubt, indeed, whether the Conservatives would wish for such an appeal, as an issue more unfavourable to them could not well be imagined. The Lords would throw out the first Bill sent up to them for limiting their veto. A similar Bill would be sent up in the next Session, and it would be intimated to them that, should it be thrown out, a sufficient number of peers would be created to rectify the balance. Rather than have their numbers thus increased, they would—as they did on the first Reform Bill—at once succumb.

I came across the other day a scheme of House of Lords reform propounded by Lord Meath. There were to be in this new House a hundred hereditary members, a certain number of bishops, a few life members, and a few recommended by learned societies and such like. I think, however, that when the Government takes action in regard to the Lords, it should in the first instance limit itself to converting the present veto into a suspensory one. When this be done it will be time enough to amend the composition of the Upper Chamber.

THE BEWILDERED ROBIN AND THE EFFUSIVE MISSEL-THRUSH.

Cock-robin once, prospecting round
For Food, a Lump of Suet found,
And, seizing in his Beak the Treasure,
Flew off to eat it at his Leisure.
But as he sped to his Retreat,
He chanced the Missel-Thrush to meet,
Who, hailing in effusive Trim,
Turned back and flew alongside him.
"How wags the World with you, sweet Bobs!
And how's the Missus and the Squabs?
My Hen must really come and call.
She longs to hear about you all.
How fit you look, how young, how sprightly!
For, gad, your Years you carry lightly!
And that red Waistcoat—truth to tell—
Becomes you most amazing well.
Hard we so seldom see each other,
Though, troth, I love you like a Brother!
It seems an endless Age, I vow,
Since last we had a nice Pow-Wow."
Cock-robin stared, bewildered he
By all this Cordiality,
And wondered what had made Dan Thrush
So suddenly begin to Gush;

Which conduct puzzled him the more
Because, when they had met before,
The other with contemptuous Stare
Had always passed him in the Air.
What was the Reason of this Change,
So noticeable, sudden, strange?
None, at the first, could Bobby find,
But soon it flashed across his Mind,
(And as it flashed, for truth he knew it)
The Reason was——that Lump of Suet!

SCRUTATOR.

AN EDALJI INQUIRY AT LAST.

NOW that Mr. Gladstone has—contrary, I confess, to my expectation—ordered an official inquiry into the Edalji case, it would not be becoming to say anything of a controversial nature on the subject, nor is there any occasion to do so. But one thing I should like to say—namely, that if the inquiry is to do what the public will expect of it, it must be a public inquiry and the reference must be in the widest terms. The inquiry ought not to be limited to the circumstances immediately attending the arrest and trial of Mr. Edalji, even supplemented by subsequent events bearing upon the justice of the conviction. In order to get to the bottom of the mystery, and to clear up all those questions affecting the attitude of the police towards Mr. Edalji and his family which the public is most concerned about, it is necessary that the Committee (or whatever it is to be) should be instructed to go back to the first outbreak of anonymous letter-writing at Great Wyrley Vicarage in 1888, and follow the course of events from that time down to Mr. Edalji's arrest in 1903. It is equally necessary that the inquiry should extend to all the official dealings of the Home Office with the case, and particularly that the full truth should be disclosed as to the communications that passed between the Home Office and the Chief Constable of Staffordshire after the first petition on the prisoner's behalf was presented. I trust that Mr. Gladstone will see the importance of this, for the concession of the inquiry which has been so often sought and refused puts the Home Office itself on its trial in a certain measure; and in the interest of justice it is far better that this should be officially recognised, so that the Office may defend itself in the open, than that it should be under an inducement to do so by pulling wires behind the scenes. The importance of holding the inquiry absolutely in public will be recognised, I should hope, spontaneously.

There is one other matter which I would earnestly press upon the attention of my readers. Sir A. Conan Doyle has already put it to the public in his letter to the Daily Telegraph on Monday. Mr. Edalji is at present a convict on ticket-of-leave; his father possesses but a microscopic apology for a "living"; and the limited means of the family have been severely taxed by the expenses of the son's trial and conviction. To place the case adequately before any tribunal necessarily involves the expenditure of money. Counsel must be instructed, evidence collected and put into shape, and so on; and it is impossible that this can be properly done unless the public will contribute the money.

Accordingly, Sir Conan Doyle has formed a small committee, of which he and Sir George Lewis are members, and Mr. J. Hall Richardson, of the Daily Telegraph, treasurer, to collect a fund for this purpose, and be responsible for its proper application. When the Edalji case has been under discussion in Truth a good many people have written to me at one time and another expressing a desire to manifest their sympathy with the prisoner by subscribing to any fund that might be raised for the purpose of securing a revision of his sentence. I beg them now to make good their offers, and I ask my readers generally to join. It is not a very large sum that is required, but it is wanted quickly. Any contributions to it may be sent to Mr. Richardson at the Daily Telegraph Office, or if they are sent to the Editor of Truth he will be pleased to forward them to their proper destination.

THE TIMES AND ITS CRITICS.

The Saturday Review stated last week that the proprietors of the Times had decided to part with the Book Club and with Mr. Moberly Bell at the same time. The whole statement has since been categorically denied by Mr. Moberly Bell. I can only say pity 'tis 'tis not true, for the longer the present situation continues the more evident it becomes that its continued association with the Book Club must utterly destroy the character of the Times as a newspaper. On Wednesday last the Times devoted the best part of one of its columns to a letter from "The Manager of the Times Book Club," presumably the same Mr. Carr who figured so agreeably as the alter ego of Mr. Twelves, of Antwerp, in the transactions described in Truth of January 23. The letter had reference to the business relations of Mrs. Atherton with Mr. John Murray. The lady is one of those authors who have spoken out frankly on the publishers' side, and Mr. Carr's object is to prove to her that in the case of one of her books "Mr. Murray mulcted Mrs. Atherton of £625." He is careful to explain that he does not accuse Mr. Murray of dishonesty, though he thinks that she would have been better off in the hands of two dishonest publishers of whom she confesses she has had experience. But Mrs. Atherton was "mulcted" to this extent "in order that Mr. Murray might preserve the fine old traditions of the house in Albemarle-street"—though it is not clear how this motive is to be reconciled with the previous suggestion that Mrs. Atherton had "unwittingly contributed" the £625 "to this campaign fund of the publishers' trust." This, with a few tasteful allusions to the "arrogance" and "pomposity" of Mr. Murray, who is compared to a waiter pouring out with "insolence" a champagne glass half full of froth, is the gist of the letter.

With the question thus raised as between Mrs. Atherton and Mr. Murray I am not in the least concerned, and I am not clear that anybody else is. Mr.

Carr is of opinion that Mr. Murray will not answer him, because "he has learned from the leaders of trusts in other trades that the complaints of the public may be treated with silent contempt." Mr. Carr, when he is abusing respectable people for their arrogance and pomposity, really ought not to suggest that he and his bookshop constitute "the public"; but even if there were in the letter anything in the nature of a "complaint of the public" against Mr. Murray, the latter gentleman may easily have other reasons for treating Mr. Carr with silent contempt besides his supposed studies at the feet of leaders of trusts. The majority of mankind consider that there is a certain style of attack which cannot be answered without loss of self-respect. For this reason a gentleman does not enter into an argument for the amusement of a crowd with a cabman who becomes abusive over a dispute about a fare. If the cabman goes too far, he calls in a policeman; if the cabman is careful to say nothing which will justify the interference of the police, he walks away before a crowd collects. I do not know whether this is Mr. Murray's attitude towards Mr. Carr, but if it is, he is fully justified in it, Mr. Carr having been careful to keep himself outside the reach of the law. All that I am concerned about is the simple fact that an attack of this character should be made upon any gentleman in the columns of the Times, by an employee of the Times, in the course of a dispute about pounds, shillings, and pence between that gentleman and the Times.

The character of the incident is aggravated by the last revelation of the trade tricks to which the Times has lately condescended, and of the part played in them by Mr. Carr himself. The reader will understand what I mean by turning back to Truth of January 23. Mr. Carr is there exhibited as the protagonist in a plot, carried out in the name of the Times, for the purpose of practising an imposition on eight different London publishers. To this end Mr. Carr assumes the character of one Twelves of Antwerp, whose agent he claims to be, and whose blank order forms he keeps in stock—apparently for this specific purpose. In the name of Twelves of Antwerp, which he himself signs, he gives to an export bookseller in London an order for upwards of a thousand volumes recently issued by those eight publishers; and with it printed labels, also kept in stock, by which the parcels are to be addressed to an agent of the Times Book Club in London. Armed with these materials, the export bookseller is to go to the eight publishers, obtain books for Twelves of Antwerp, on special terms which are not applicable to the home trade, deliver them to the agent of the Times, and receive payment from the Times. Whether the law is strong enough to protect any tradesman against an imposition of this kind, I do not know; but it is clear that the object is to obtain books for the Times on terms which the vendor would not sell them if he knew whom he was dealing with, and to give the Times a valuable advantage at the expense of its trade competitors—in other words, to put money into the pockets of the Times. Is it for the Times, after being caught in the act of perpetrating a disreputable trick of this kind, to throw a column of studied insults at one of the most respected of London publishers, and in all but the name to call him a pick-pocket—certainly to abuse him as one? If there is any question of pocket-picking in the matter, it does not seem to be on the publishers' side. Whether the publishers are wise or unwise in their trade arrangements, they at any rate conduct their business straightforwardly and honourably. They do not disguise themselves in foreign merchants' clothes, and use other people's signatures, in order to obtain goods on more favourable terms than their competitors. And it seems like adding insult to injury that when the Times wants to vilify one of the class it is conspiring to impose upon, it should put up for the purpose Mr. Twelves of Antwerp, or Mr. Carr—I really do not know which may be which.

In the same issue containing the attack of the Book Club manager on Mr. Murray, the Times published a letter from a well-known novelist, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, protesting against a Times review of his latest book being headed with the now familiar notice requesting subscribers to the Book Club not to ask for it. Mr. Phillpotts wrote warmly, and the Times was under no obligation to publish his letter. But it chose to do so, and to reply to it in a leading article. If this article was not written by the Manager of the Book Club, it was, at any rate, fully worthy of him. The purport of it was that Mr. Eden Phillpotts had attacked the Times, not the Times him, and that for all he complained of he had only himself to thank. This retort is based of necessity upon an ingenious perversion of fact; thus: "Either by his own act, or through the publishers whom he has made his sole agents—it does not matter which—Mr. Phillpotts refuses to sell to the Book Club copies of his book at trade prices. . . . He refuses to sell copies to the Club at full retail prices." It is scarcely necessary to point out that the representation of the issue is here effected by the use of the term "prices." The point which is in dispute, as all the world knows, is not one of prices as between the trade and the Book Club, but of the price at which the Book Club is to re-sell. The true statement of the case is that the Book Club refuses to buy of Mr. Phillpotts' agents on the ordinary trade terms. The Club is fighting to obtain terms for itself which the ordinary trade not only does not get, but which it does not want. The Times is making war on "the ordinary trade" as well as on the ordinary trade terms, and that being so, and the fact being notorious, surely it is as disingenuous as it is futile to pretend that it is being refused ordinary terms. Yet this pretence is set up in a Times leading article, and made the occasion for lecturing and ridiculing an unfortunate author who protests against the injury which the Times may do him by the weapons it is using in a war of its own making.

When I say that it is a pity that the Times has not decided to sever itself from the Book Club, it is because I am horrified at the figure it cuts in incidents such as these, and incidents which are occurring every week. Only a few weeks ago the newspapers reported that "Mr. H. E. Hooper, of the Times, Printing House Square, applied (in the City of London Court) to have Mr. W. D. Howe, metal worker, Higham-street, Walthamstow, committed for non-payment of £5 12s., balance due for an 'Encyclopædia Britannica' supplied." Defendant pleaded that business was bad, that he only earned 25s. a week, and could not pay even 3s. a month. "Just imagine the Times thundering away at this poor metal-worker," said the Judge; "no order!" Just imagine it! And imagine also that the poor metal-worker has learned by this time, as everybody has, the true history of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and knows how he was gammoned into contracting the debt for which the Times was seeking to send him to prison. In one of many letters received after the appearance of the "Twelves of Antwerp" revelations, I was taken to task by a Radical admirer for being too hard on the Times. How can anybody be too hard on a business conducted with such utter disregard of its past traditions, and of every principle that makes a newspaper powerful and respected? It is perfectly true that the manner in which a private business is conducted is not, as a rule, a matter of public concern. But the business of the newspaper which so long gave the lead and set the example to the English press is an exception to that rule, or, to speak more correctly, it is not an ordinary private business. I am told by the critic above mentioned, that the "Twelves of Antwerp" business is merely an example of a common trade trick, never regarded as very heinous, and condoned on the principle that "all is fair in war." Very possibly; but I have yet to learn that the principle that "all is fair in war" is applicable to commercial operations in peace; and the reference to a common trade trick hardly helps the Times, for it is just the importation of common trade tricks into the business of the leading London journal which is the matter for condemnation. Moreover, I am perfectly sure that the course which the Times has lately been pursuing must prove fatal to itself, and that the best friends of the paper are those who say so the most plainly.

THE PRIESTCRAFT OF MEDICINE.

A case has just occurred which illustrates in a very remarkable way the powers and pretensions of medical trade-unionism. Briefly stated, the case is this: A West End physician of good repute holds strong views adverse to the method of treatment of a particular class of diseases generally favoured for the moment by his professional brethren. He finds it impossible to obtain a hearing through professional channels, including one of the leading professional journals. He then embodies his views in a book, issued in the ordinary way, and avowedly addressed to the public, or so much of the public as it may concern. He is called upon by the Royal College of Physicians, of which he [illegible]mber, to explain his conduct in publishing [illegible] recognised, [illegible]n intimation being given to him that it [illegible] the open, than [illegible]t to do [illegible] a well-recognised principle of profession[illegible] conduct." He replies that the book is its own explanation, and that as he has no other to offer, he anticipates any further action on the part of the College by resigning his membership and removing his name from the medical register. It will be seen at once that the question which the Royal College of Physicians has thus raised is one of supreme importance to the public at large.

The incident to which I refer has naturally been the subject of a good deal of correspondence; but the point really lies in a nutshell, and if the whole of what has passed between the parties were published, it would add little to the above statement. But in order to show the public importance of the question at issue, and that there may be no room for doubt as to the precise attitude both of the College and of the physician concerned, I subjoin a few extracts from this correspondence. The physician is Mr. John Shaw, M.D.Lond., of New Cavendish-street, a Fellow and former Vice-President of the British Gynæcological Society, and late Physician for Diseases of Women in the North-West London Hospital. His correspondence with the College began with the following letter:—

Royal College of Physicians,
London, S.W.
January 12, 1907.

Dear Sir,—The attention of the President and Censors, at their meeting yesterday, was drawn to a work recently published by yourself, entitled "Fibroid Tumours: a New Treatment. . . . . without Operation." Complaints reached them that the book had been obviously written with a view to its being placed in the hands of the general public, and that the Author has addressed himself directly to women suffering from the maladies of which it treats. This constitutes a distinct breach of a well recognised principle of professional conduct. It is thought, moreover, to be very undesirable for their own welfare that patients should have their attention directed to much which is thus communicated.

Having examined the book, the President and Censors regret to find that it fully bears out the principal charge as stated above, and desire me to ask if you have any explanation which you may wish to offer them respecting it.—I remain, faithfully yours, (Signed) Edward Liveing, M.D.,
Registrar.

To Dr. John Shaw, M.R.C.P.

Dr. Shaw replied to this letter at considerable length. The following are the most material portions of his answer:—

I have already stated, in acknowledging your letter, that, "without admitting that any 'explanation' is necessary in addition to the very explicit statements made in the preface and elsewhere in my book," I would bow to the decision of the President and Censors, and "with all urgency prepare a statement of the circumstances (from my point of view) which apparently have been brought to a head by your letter of the 12th inst." Briefly stated, they are as follows:—

The British Medical Journal—the official organ of the British Medical Association, with a very important non-medical circulation (exceeding, so far as I can judge, that of many lay journals)—made the specific statement with regard to fibroid tumours of the womb, that "the risks of operation are probably less than those of non-operation." On the other hand, I conclude that the risks of operation are more than five hundred times greater than those of non-operation, and that operation is, moreover, liable to be followed by cancer. And it is a noteworthy fact that in the review of my book (December 1, 1906) the journal leaves my statistics severely alone—although I had by letter drawn the Editor's attention thereto—and attempts no justification for its own statements, merely remarking that "we are under the impression (sic) that a great deal has been written about the harmlessness of many uterine fibroids." It must be remembered, moreover, that I had repeatedly tried to gain publicity for the alternative non-operative methods of treatment, but unavailingly.

Excluding the personal aspect, the position appears to me thus:—A statement was made in a journal with an important non-medical circulation, calculated (from my point of view) to involve those who might trust therein, in a possible disaster incomparably greater than that which might be occasioned in the fraudulent statements of a company prospectus, for "the life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment"; and yet the President and Censors of the Royal College of Physicians, a corporation the very raison d'être of which is the public weal, ask me for an explanation for doing what I could to minimise that which I regard as a grave injustice to the community. And this you speak of as "the principal charge." Is it unnatural that I should be surprised? . . . . .

The next passage, which I omit, relates to previous communications which had passed on the same subject between Dr. Shaw and the British Gynæcological Society. His letter then proceeds:

Moreover, it is not only in regard to protest against mutilative operations on women that I have failed to reach the ear of the profession through the usual and proper channels. And I would like those of my professional colleagues, whose good opinion I still value, to clearly understand, that it was only after having come to the conclusion that the position was hopeless, that I addressed the public directly, in contravention to practice, which I perfectly recognise as the "usual and proper course." I had, in fact, been equally unfortunate in gaining a hearing in answer to a statement made in the British Medical Journal, of November 4, 1905, by an eminent surgeon, to the effect that "in no single case have we yet seen a genuine scirrhus or an undoubted epithelioma" (either of the two chief types of cancer, it will be noted) "whose course has been modified or whose growth has been hindered for a single day by any of their methods," that is to say, "by high frequency currents, various kinds of serum, the injection of complex organic compounds, et hoc genus omne."

In my submitted answer, not only were cases set forth, the cancerous nature of which I had subsequently doubted on the simple ground of the success attained, but also others of whose character there could be no possible doubt, and some of these were still available for the inspection and examination of the surgeon just quoted, and although the space required by my letter was approximately but one half that which had been devoted to an artificial purgative of foreign origin—indexed under its proprietary name—the length of my letter was the alleged ground for refusing publication.

Not unnaturally, such opposition excited in my mind a desire to study the matter further, and, as the consequence of that investigation, not only did I arrive at the results published in "Fibroid Tumour," but I have come to the conclusion that the "caution, and logical attitude taken up by the hospital surgeons of this country in reference to the treatment of cancer by other than operative measures," has brought about the following deplorable condition of affairs: The increased frequency of operations, the earlier date at which they are undertaken, their wider extent and greater thoroughness, although accompanied by a greatly decreased primary mortality, are followed by an increased mortality from cancer, of such alarming proportions, that the annual increment of mortality from cancer of the breast per million women, of 35 years of age and upwards, in the period 1898 to 1901, amounted to three times that which ruled in the periods 1868 to 1888, and thence on to 1893; and the annual increment from 1901 to 1904 is actually more than nine times that prevailing during the period of least operative activity. . . .

For upwards of 30 years I have worked at my profession with a strenuousness which has been, I presume, equalled by few of those who enjoy its rewards, and exceeded, perhaps, by none. And now, with responsibilities which would make me giddy to contemplate you force me into a decision of the gravest moment. Not only do I resign the Membership of the Royal College of Physicians, but I shall take off my name from the Medical Register, in the hope that—from the outside—I may be better able to rouse the conscience of the profession, and the consciousness of the people and their Parliament, to the grave need of the amendment of the Medical Acts, and of the far greater dangers of the Medical Acts Amendment Bill, some of the provisions of which are calculated, not only to aggravate the ills from which the rank and file of the profession are suffering, but to constitute a public peril of the first magnitude.

Herewith, please receive the Diploma of Membership, which I hereby resign; and I need scarcely add that the material parts of our correspondence will be submitted for publication.—Yours faithfully, (Signed) John Shaw.

When this correspondence was placed before me, I communicated with Dr. Shaw, in order to ascertain whether there was any ground for supposing that the College had any other complaint against him besides what is contained in it. He assures me that there is no such ground, and that he has never previously had any difference with the professional authorities during the thirty years that he has been in practice. I conveyed to him my opinion that his resignation of his diploma and removal of his name from the Medical Register were tactical errors, and that he would have been wiser to have fought out the dispute à outrance, and, if necessary, to seek the protection of the Law Courts. But his reply is that he has no desire to bring a personal grievance before the public, or to pose as a martyr. His object is simply to call public attention to what he believes to be the truth about surgical operations in the cases above-mentioned; and he withdraws from his profession in order that he may obtain a free hand for that purpose. Whether he has been wise or not as a matter of tactics, and from his own point of view, there can be no two opinions as to the honourable and unselfish motives that have actuated him in the course he has taken. And it is equally clear that there is no personal question involved in the dispute, but merely one of principle—a principle of the most vital public importance.

What is really the offence for which Dr. Shaw has been called to account by his College? Obviously it is not the mere publication of a book on a question of professional treatment of a certain class of disease. This is done with impunity every day; and not only is it done in books, but in communications to the press, both lay and professional. The gravamen of Dr. Shaw's offence lies in the fact that he rejects the current opinion of the profession in a matter of profound importance, and that being silenced by a sort of professional boycott, he appeals directly to the public by showing them what he believes to be the truth. This is the unpardonable sin to punish which the professional machinery is set in motion, and it is to escape the punishment which would have inevitably fallen upon him, unless he had undertaken to withdraw his book from circulation and hold his tongue in future, that he has to resign his diploma and remove his name from the register. What we see here is, therefore, simply that attitude of resistance to the free public discussion of the sacred mysteries of the craft, which has been characteristic of the medical profession in all ages, and of no other, as far as I know, except the clerical. The voice of the Royal College of Physicians is simply the voice of the mediæval Church, directed to the cure of bodies instead of the cure of souls. Listen to it again:—"The book has been obviously written with a view to its being placed in the hands of the general public. . . . It is thought to be very undesirable that patients should have their attention directed to much which is thus communicated." What does this mean? That the patient must be kept in the dark; that he must have no opinion but that of his father confessor, the family doctor; that knowledge must be confined to the initiated, in order that they may be supreme; that the Gospel of Science must not be preached in a tongue understanded of the people. And all this forsooth, not for the benefit of the priesthood of medicine, but for the welfare of the laity, who will assuredly go to the devil if they are allowed to have an opinion about their own salvation. For these reasons, Dr. Shaw is a heretic of the most dangerous type, who must be put to silence. Not only is he preaching false doctrine, but he is a traitor to his own order. He would strip mystery from knowledge, open the eyes of the profane crowd, and allow the laity to judge for themselves in matters pertaining to their own welfare, instead of accepting with becoming faith what they are told by the inspired wisdom of the Brahmins of Science. There are men who tell us that leechcraft—if I may coin a convenient word—has taken in the modern world the place which priestcraft has lost. That it would if it could, Dr. Shaw's case goes far to prove.

Now, what is the weapon which the craft uses for such purposes and with such effect in this instance, and how is it obtained? The weapon is trade unionism, and it is supplied by Act of Parliament and Royal Charter; that is to say, the power which seems to be used here with so little regard to the public interest and approval is derived directly from public authority. It is a State-created power. Personally, I am a firm believer in trade-unionism; but I recognise that its power must in every case be subordinated to the interest of the community at large. Whether in the case of men who work for a trade employer at weekly wages, or of professionl men who are paid directly by their "clients" or "patients," at so much per job, it is necessary for their welfare that the mischief of free individual competition should be restrained; and for this purpose trades and professions are entrusted by law with certain rights of organisation and disciplinary powers over their members. This is incidentally for the benefit of the members themselves, but the justification for it is the benefit of the community, because the welfare of the community is only the aggregate welfare of its constituent parts. For this reason due care must be taken that the power given to any particular section for its own benefit is not used to encroach on the welfare of the rest. In the particular case of Dr. Shaw there is such encroachment, and it is not an exceptional case, but an example of a tendency which is always at work, and which the public must combat in its own defence. I have already pointed out how careful the Royal College of Physicians is to insist that it is actuated by regard, not merely for professional propriety or etiquette, but for the welfare of patients, who "ought not to have their attention directed to much" which Dr. Shaw has endeavoured to communicate to them. No doubt the incorporated Brahmins honestly believe this; just as their theological predecessors believed it in the time of Huss, or Wycliff, or "the fires of Smithfield." But in these days the public claims the right to know the whole truth in matters of medicine no less than in matters of theology. The doctrine of a sacred caste presiding over mysteries incomprehensible to the uninitiated is out of date in matters affecting the temporal welfare of the community as much as in those affecting its spiritual. And it is well for medicine as well as religion that it should be so. At the bottom of the doctrine lies quackery, for the ignorance of the patient is the soil which nourishes the ignorance of the doctor. Public discussion, however much impeded by ignorance of technicalities, is the only atmosphere conducive to scientific progress, and public opinion, however ill-informed, is in the long run the best, if not the only, test of scientific truth. The patient, therefore, simply cannot know too much, especially on matters about which doctors disagree, and there can be no real motive for keeping him in the dark except to increase the importance and the profits of his doctor. I leave the reader to judge how far the claim of professional secrecy made ostensibly for the patient's welfare, in the letter of the Royal College of Physicians to Dr. Shaw, differs in principle from that of the quack who professes to be the sole depository of a valuable medical secret. But the only difference I myself can see is that in the latter case the claim is made for the benefit of an individual, in the other for that of the profession collectively.

It is a question for public consideration how far the law, which gives the professional organisation jurisdiction over the individual practitioner, requires such amendment as will preclude its being used to suppress alleged scientific heresy, or to hinder the public from knowing what they have a right to know. In my judgment, every man whose name is removed from the official register of qualified practitioners should have a right of appeal to the High Court, and there are other reasons for this besides those revealed in Dr. Shaw's case. In the meantime, however, it is obvious that the best corrective of the abuse here pointed out lies with the public and the press, who, if they choose, can defeat any "conspiracy of silence" and any measures taken in pursuance of it on the part of the profession. I ought not, therefore, to conclude these remarks without drawing special attention to the technical question at issue between Dr. Shaw and the profession. Its public importance is best indicated by his assertion that the increased frequency of operation for fibroid tumour has been followed by such an increased mortality from cancer, that between 1898 and 1901 the mortality from cancer of the breast in women over thirty-five years of age was three times what it had been during the previous twenty years, and in the three subsequent years nine times. It is no business of mine to say whether these figures are accurate, or whether there is any "causal relation" between the two sets of facts, if they are facts. But it is everybody's business that when such statements are made by a physician of long experience and good repute, they should be rationally answered; and until they are refuted by some more convincing method than calling the man who makes them before the Council of his college for a breach of professional etiquette, the public will be wise to take note of them. It is to be hoped, therefore, that in his efforts to call public attention to the truth, as he understands it, Dr. Shaw will be thoroughly successful. Right or wrong, he is working only in the public interest, and should, therefore, have the fullest public support until it has been proved that he is wrong.

THE MUTUAL, OF NEW YORK, AND ITS MANAGER.

The deferred judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady in the case of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York v. the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company and Mr. D. C. Haldeman has excited a great deal of interest in insurance circles, and some little surprise. Mr. Haldeman had been for many years the manager of the British branch of the Mutual; he resigned his position, became joint life-manager of the North British and Mercantile, issued from his private address a circular to policy-holders, recommending them to transfer from the Mutual to the North British, and was the means of taking over to the latter Company several of the Mutual agents. The trial of the action lasted for eleven days, and with one exception (to be referred to presently) his lordship found that Mr. Haldeman was justified in taking the course he did. The question which insurance men, and, indeed, business men generally, are asking themselves, is whether this judgment will facilitate the manager or other employee of one Company transferring the business of that Company to another Company whose service he subsequently enters.

Mr. Haldeman's position was a very difficult one. The scandals which had taken place in the American life offices and the sensational way in which they were treated in the press undoubtedly gave rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction among policy-holders, and a policy-holders' committee was formed, which considered the subject and made various representations to the head office in New York. Mr. Haldeman wrote to many influential policy-holders, and some of them at his request joined this committee; Mr. Haldeman attended many of its meetings, and was closely in touch with its work throughout. Although this committee was not elected by policy-holders, it is quite probable that a number of large policy-holders working together and in touch with the general manager of the Company for this country might prove a very effective means of reassuring the general body of policy-holders and preventing them from taking any precipitate action adverse to their own interests, or to the real welfare of the Company of which they were members. Mr. Haldeman and this committee did not feel satisfied with the way things were going in New York, and gradually took up a position of pronounced hostility to the Company, which culminated in the recommendation that policy-holders should leave the Mutual and transfer to the North British and Mercantile.

Communication with the policy-holders was made possible through the Committee being supplied with a list of their names and addresses, and the comments of insurance men principally relate to two points: the propriety of such a list being used to transfer policy-holders from one office to another, and the disadvantages to the policy-holders themselves that result from such a course. "Policy-twisting," as it is called, is universally condemned not only as unfair between one company and another, but as being bad for the assured. Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady found that in this case at least the course adopted was justifiable; but there is a question of insurance fact which did not come before his Lordship, and as to which no doubt can possibly exist. In Mr. Haldeman's circular of May 10, 1906, the day after he left the Mutual, he said: "The offer is open to all British policy-holders to exchange their Mutual policies free of any sacrifice, for a policy in the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company." In a circular issued nine days later this statement was modified, and Messrs. Cockburn and Haldeman, the joint life-managers of the North British, clearly stated that some policy-holders could not transfer without loss, and that the solvency of the Mutual was not in question. The inaccuracy of Mr. Haldeman's first circular is manifest, and was subsequently admitted. There may well be differences of opinion as to which policy-holders could or could not transfer from the Mutual to the North British without incurring loss, and there is the further point that some policy-holders, feeling disturbed by past occurrences in the Mutual, might prefer to change, even if they sacrificed something by so doing. In spite, however, of the great extravagance of the Mutual in the past, it is easily proved that, in the great majority of cases, policy-holders would lose by transferring to the North British, because they would forfeit all the bonuses earned by the premiums already paid to the Mutual. As a bonus-earning office the North British and Mercantile is not in the front rank, and a man assuring twenty years ago at the same premium in both the Mutual and the North British would, under most policies, have done far better in the American than in the English company. These American results were accomplished during the prevalence of extravagance, and at the time policy-holders were being advised to transfer great economies had been and were being introduced, and these must inevitably increase the bonuses of the Mutual, thereby making its superiority over the North British still more manifest. Many policy-holders took the advice of actuaries and other experts upon the advisability of transferring, and in almost every case where competent independent advice was taken policy-holders were told that they would lose by transferring.

A good deal was said to the effect that the North British only wanted to obtain policy-holders who had already decided to leave the Mutual: probably the suggestion of the North British arose out of the notion that policy-holders were leaving the Mutual; but at a subsequent stage the attention of the former agents of the Mutual and other representatives of the North British was not confined to these cases, which must have been exceedingly few, if any. I have before me at the present time a letter from a man who took out a policy at the age of fifty-six, who had paid premiums to the Mutual for seven years, and was entitled to a bonus three years hence. He seems to have announced his intention of transferring to the North British. He subsequently obtained advice, found that he would lose, and determined to continue with the Mutual. He says: "I pointed out to Mr. Haldeman that in contradistinction to his assurance in one of his circulars that 'the transfer could be effected without any sacrifice,' this would entail a very heavy sacrifice. . . . . After some quibbling, and my threatening legal proceedings, Mr. Haldeman sent my cheque back." Another policy-holder also wished not to transfer after proposing to do so, and in this case my correspondent says: "Mr. Haldeman begs the question, and the matter is still under correspondence, and some talk of legal proceedings is being made."

Some light is thrown upon this subject by a memorandum or minute of the directors of the North British and Mercantile, when dealing with the appointment of Mr. Haldeman. It says: "To secure the business," i.e., the business of the Mutual, "it will be desirable to take over Mr. Haldeman in an important position. He has been general manager for Great Britain of the Mutual for nineteen years. . . . Mr. Haldeman could bring into the North British service some twelve or so canvassers in London and elsewhere selected from a larger number." The North British directors among themselves, to judge from the above minute, were simply looking to the fact that if Mr. Haldeman were given an appointment he could bring them some of the connections and agency organisation of the Mutual. What proportion of these connections and organisation they expected to obtain, and did obtain, I do not know, but to judge from the price offered for the good-will of the Star Life Office, the total British connections and organisation of the Mutual would be worth something like £250,000. The Judge held that these transactions were right and proper, but it is the hope of insurance men, for the sake of the welfare of policy-holders, and of insurance business as a whole, that only the most extraordinary special circumstances can be held to justify the partial destruction of the business of an admittedly solvent Company and the persuasion of policy-holders to take a course which is against their interests.

It was shown in the evidence that Mr. Haldeman supplied the policy-holders' Committee with a list of the addresses of policy-holders for the purpose of acknowledging subscriptions. In the words of the Judge:—"Certainly that was the purpose for which it was supplied." The Company raised no objection to the Committee having the list of policy-holders for this purpose, but the Mutual would have raised very strong objections indeed had they supposed that the list would be used, as it was, for sending out a circular recommending people to transfer from the Mutual, and enclosing a prospectus of the North British and Mercantile. It is the use of this list of Mutual policy-holders for the purpose of transferring the Mutual business to the North British which insurance men regard with apprehension.

On only one point had Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady any adverse comment to make on Mr. Haldeman's action. This was in regard to the "coffin." On December 23, 1906, Mr. Haldeman took a box, popularly called the "coffin," which contained cards bearing the names and addresses of the Mutual policy-holders, to one of the Company's bankers—the Guarantee Company, of New York—and deposited it in the names of himself and one of the directors of the bank. At this time Mr. Haldeman was manager of the Mutual and had not sent in his resignation. Asked what he was going to do with those cards, Mr. Haldeman replied, "I was going to place those cards at the disposal of the policy-holders of the Mutual, so that they could communicate with each other. For their communicating with each other—organising if you like to use the word." A few days after Mr. Haldeman entered the employ of the North British he—the joint life manager of the North British—sent to the Mutual's bankers for the Mutual's property—namely, the "coffin" full of cards—and a very intelligent commissionaire understood that his orders were to take it to the offices of the North British and Mercantile, where it actually was taken. The Judge considers that it was taken to the offices of the North British and Mercantile by mistake, because Mr. Haldeman says that he ordered it to be taken to the committee's solicitor. It would obviously be a nicer story if the box had not been taken to the North British offices; but the commissionaire said, in soldier-like fashion: "I took the order to bring it to the North British and Mercantile. I took that as my instruction and carried it out."

His Lordship's commenting on this matter speaks of there being "no justification whatever for the course taken by Haldeman with reference to the cards. He was not entitled to remove them for use on a future occasion by the North British policy-holders if need for it should arise. The cards were the property of the Company, and should never have been removed from the Company's premises, and it is fortunate for Haldeman that no use whatever was made of them. . ."

Mr. Haldeman's position was undoubtedly a trying one, and the judgment of the Court acquits him of all blame, with the one exception just mentioned: but there is no doubt in the minds of insurance men that extremely serious evils would result if an official of a Company whose policy-holders were dissatisfied could, whether by means of a committee or in other ways, make a list of policy-holders and transfer them and the agency organisation to another office, especially when, as in this case, the policy-holders in the majority of instances suffered loss through taking the advice that was tendered to them.

THE ALIEN IN BANKRUPTCY.

In a recent speech Mr. Lloyd-George referred to bankruptcy administration as one of the directions in which his department can assist British trade; and there can be no question about that. Not only is the present system of bankruptcy administration inordinately expensive, and for that reason most unsatisfactory in its results to creditors—though this seems to be an inherent defect of all bankruptcy systems—but the law as it stands lends itself to gross abuses, and is for that reason a danger rather than a protection to honest traders. It may be assumed that evidence of this last statement has been obtained by the departmental committee that has been considering the shortcomings of the present bankruptcy practice; but it is a subject of which the public at large knows little, and of which it ought to know more if the need of reform in the law is to be properly understood and adequately dealt with in Parliament.

In order to see the scandals of the present system blooming and bearing fruit in the greatest profusion, one must go to the East side of London. The man who has shown the greatest enterprise and acumen in exploiting the field presented to him by the English Bankruptcy Acts is not the Englishman—though he sometimes works this field with highly profitable results—but the intelligent foreigner who comes to start in business among us. Needless to say, he is frequently a German, and not unfrequently a Jew, but it is when he is both that our bankruptcy system yields the biggest harvest. In recent years several remarkable examples of this have been given in these columns. My attention has lately been called to several more, and I think they will astonish every reader who has not already a personal acquaintance with East-End bankruptcy business. The first case is that of a firm called Zimbler and Friedmann, of Whitechapel-road, who were adjudicated bankrupt in the High Court a few months ago. Being always averse to unfair imputations upon our German neighbours and friends, I am glad to be able to say that Mr. Zimbler, although a Jew, is not a German, but a Russian. He came to London at the beginning of 1905; possibly he was fleeing from persecution, and if so, he must indeed have felt before long that, like his ancestors of old, he had escaped from Egypt to a land flowing with milk and honey. Mr. Friedmann, with whom he started in business in Whitechapel, is his son-in-law, but I do not know his nationality. The pair carried on business, it would seem, almost exclusively on credit obtained from wholesale houses for fifteen months, when they suspended payment. Their position then, as stated by themselves to the Court, was that they owed, under various heads, £5,579, and that their tangible assets consisted of £84 in cash, trade fixtures, etc., to the value of £20, and stamped cheques to the value of 19s. 10d.—total, £104 19s. 10d. Book debts owing to them to the amount of £1,079 were valued by them at another £92 odd. So far from being insolvent, however, they estimated that they had a surplus of £23,025 12s. 10s., this figure being arrived at by adding to the above assets a trifle of £28,414 13s. 8d., the surplus from the private estate of Mr. Zimbler. The accounts furnished in respect of this private estate showed that there existed in the hands of secured creditors property to the value of £107,600 against debts to the amount of £77,950, leaving a balance to the good of £29,650. Hence the surplus on Zimbler's private estate above mentioned. Except for this surplus of £29,650 from his secured creditors, the debtor returned his private assets as "nil;" that is to say he declared that apart from the £29,650, and the partnership assets already mentioned, he had not a penny in the world in cash, furniture, or other property. The security which was to yield the surplus of £29,650 consisted, according to his statement, of freehold property in Walthamstow, Tottenham, and elsewhere. The property seems to have had an existence, but it was mortgaged up to the hilt, or above it, and all that it actually yielded to the estate was £100 instead of £29,650, as estimated by the sanguine owner. This £100 was paid by the second mortgagee in order to protect his interest. The account of the private estate of the other partner, Mr. Friedmann, was simplicity itself. It consisted on the one side of unsecured creditors, £100; on the other, "nil." Like his partner, Friedmann possessed outside the business neither cash, furniture, nor other goods. Both being family men, this state of things was explained by their having sold all their effects to their wives. To sum up, their position after fifteen months' trading in England was that they owed individually and collectively, £6,815; and that they possessed in cash and trade effects £104 19s. 10d., plus book debts, which might be worth £22, and beyond this nothing, except Zimbler's mortgaged estate, which yielded £100. The total assets were therefore not worth £300.

With this result in view a peculiar interest attaches to the accounts furnished by the two partners of the amounts drawn by them during their brief business career in London. Here they are:—

Money drawn from business in connection with private concerns	1,980	0	0

Wife's illness and expenses to various seaside resorts	500	0	0
Household expenses	430	0	0
Money paid as a deposit on purchase of house property alleged to have been forfeited by the vendor—a personal friend	400	0	0
Accommodation bills to senior partner's brother, also now a bankrupt	476	0	0

These two accounts speak so eloquently for themselves that to offer any comment upon them may seem like insulting the reader's intelligence. But I would venture to point out how careful the two debtors are to ward off any reproach on the score of having been guilty of extravagance in living. Each has kept, you see, his household expenses down to a modest £430, which is hardly out of the way as the expenditure of a family man for a period of fifteen months. If they have drawn so much more from the business it must be put down to circumstances over which they had no control, such as a daughter's wedding, a wife's illness, "private concerns" which the Court ought not to pry into too curiously, the unkind behaviour of a personal friend over a deal in house property, or a too sympathetic attitude towards a partner's brother. What a satisfaction the drawing up of these two accounts must have afforded to the two aliens! One can almost see the Russian Jewish finger on the Russian Jewish nose. Is it wonderful that we should have many such aliens among us under the circumstances? Seeing how easy the trick is, I rather wonder that all the distressed inhabitants of the Russian Empire do not flock over here, marry their daughters, nurse their sick wives at "various seaside resorts," and draw incomes of about £2,000 a year at the expense of our princely wholesale houses.

It may be suggested that the wholesale firms which give such people credit are as much to blame as anybody else. But before that can be said it is necessary to know by what representations the credit is obtained. In the case of Mr. Zimbler it will be observed that he was by way of owning landed estate in the suburbs of London, which he valued at £107,000. I am told that he made good use of this fact, and that he was likely to do so may be inferred from his having the assurance to inform the Court that he was worth £28,414 from this property when the mortgagees were satisfied. I am also told that he was particular about paying cash until confidence was established. Under these circumstances, it is by no means difficult to understand that even a fairly cautious firm might be persuaded that he was good for a credit of a few hundred pounds.

Messrs. Zimbler and Friedmann may be taken as fairly representative of a large class of debtors, but the picturesque account of their personal drawings rendered by these two insolvent partners is quite eclipsed by one drawn up some two years ago by a debtor named Solomon in the same locality. Solomon, by the way, was the original owner of Zimbler's £107,000 freehold property in the suburbs. Zimbler bought it of him, and from the fact of both vendor and purchaser having been in the Bankruptcy Court within such a short time of one another it looks as if the amount that passed in cash could not have been very big. Solomon's liabilities were, roughly, £7,000, and his assets about £1,000. I do not know how long he had been in business, but his deficiency account disclosed the following interesting particulars of his private expenditure:—

Allowance to father and mother	412	0	0
Dowry to daughter (three months before bankruptcy)	750	0	0
Cost of marriage feast, presents, etc.	250	0	0

It will be seen that Solomon, as befits his name, had been doing things royally. Unfortunately, he does not seem to have done them by any means at his own expense. Possibly the British creditors on whom he levied tribute might not have grudged, especially to one brought up under the Mosaic dispensation, the means of doing his duty to his father and his mother in the spirit as well as the letter of the Decalogue; but they would hardly see the obligation to provide his daughter with a dot of £750, or to stand wedding presents and nuptial entertainment for alien guests to the tune of another £250. It is evidently necessary to teach these strangers within our gates that they must be just before they are generous.

To come closer up to date, there is the case of Messrs. Theodor and Henry Hill, whose public examination has been in progress for some time past and was concluded only last week. I have before me their statement of affairs, together with the Official Receiver's observations thereon. From these observations it appears that, though their family name might not suggest it, the debtors are of German nationality but naturalised as British subjects. They started in business as leather merchants in December, 1901, with a joint capital of £900. Theodor, who came from Germany in 1891, had been for fifteen years an employee in the leather trade before he started on his own account. Henry, who reached England viâ Africa in 1895, had been for some years in the cigar line in Pentonville-road, but had given up the business because it did not pay. They were adjudged bankrupt on a seizure under process in an action on October 4 last. Their statement of affairs shows that in the four years and ten months that they were in business they had accumulated on their £900 capital liabilities to the handsome amount of £11,546. Against this they estimated that they had assets to the net value of £245 5s. 1d., of which £79 odd consisted of book debts, which I am told have proved to be all bad. There was thus a little deficiency of £11,300, representing an average of over £2,200 a year for the period they had been in business. Theodor also returned an account of his private estate, showing a debt of £150 secured by a life policy, and assets nil, the explanation being that the furniture at his residence was settled on his wife, according to what seems to be the usual rule in these cases. Henry, being an unmarried man living in lodgings, rendered no account of private estate. An interesting deficiency account, purporting to explain the deficit of £11,300, is reproduced by the Official Receiver. In this the partners represent themselves as having only drawn £3,020 between them during the two years preceding their bankruptcy. They account for £2,865 as loss on trading, another £2,307 as bad debts, and £800 as "discounts to bankers and brokers"; and then come these singular items:—

Money entrusted to another person to take to Frankfort to settle with a creditor and alleged to have been lost	450	0	0
Commission paid in advance to said person to settle with said creditor	26	0	0
Money paid to Theodor Hill's father-in-law in settlement of money lent him fourteen years ago	1,700	0	0

Questioned in his public examination respecting the first item in this list, Theodor was unable to give the address of the friend whom he had sent to Frankfort to pay the £450. He had heard of him last at an hotel in Berlin. The friend, he understood, had been robbed of the money in a railway carriage on the Continent. He seems to have been a very useful friend, well worth the commission debited to him in the account. Respecting the last of the three items, Theodor's evidence was more enlightening. He stated that his father-in-law—one Julius Hirsch—had twice compounded with his creditors since the date of the alleged loan, but on neither occasion had he disclosed to his creditors the existence of this debt. Hirsch lived with his daughter and son-in-law, and Theodor Hill gave the £1,700 to his wife to pay to her father. He drew the money for the purpose in gold, and, as counsel put it, he "threw it into his wife's lap," nor did he ever afterwards ask his wife what she had done with it. It would be waste of time to comment upon these stories. The Official Receiver states, in regard to the management of the Hills' business, "there is no proper cash-book, no accounts of expenses and personal drawings have been kept, nor any trading and profit and loss accounts and balance sheets prepared." Apparently, therefore, the debtors got all the figures above-mentioned out of their heads.

From what I am told by people familiar with trade in East London, I think it may be safely assumed that the Official Receivers could produce records of scores, if not hundreds, of cases more or less similar to the above without going back many years. This implies losses to creditors amounting to many hundreds of thousands of pounds. Such a condition of things ought not to be allowed to continue, and when the true nature of the transactions in the majority of cases is taken into consideration it is a public scandal that such practices should be habitually carried on with impunity. Personally I am not one of those who rail against foreigners as such. I am, therefore, moved by no quasi-patriotic sentiment in calling attention to the doings of our alien practitioners in the art of remunerative bankruptcy. It certainly accentuates the scandal in this case, that many of the men who have brought this art to such a high pitch of perfection are casual sojourners in our midst, who are indifferent to the chief considerations which restrain natives from resorting to such practices, and who possibly contrive in many cases to "stow the swag" in safety outside the country. I do not see why we should, by the fault of our laws, place ourselves in the position of Egyptians who may be spoiled with impunity by wandering Jews. But do not let us make too much of the alien in this matter. We breed our own fraudulent bankrupts in sufficient profusion. The law is at present too tender by half both to the native and the foreigner. It needs vigorous tightening up. The relief of insolvent debtors is a necessary operation in every mercantile community; but it is equally necessary that relief should be reserved exclusively for those who come for it with clean hands, and that the prospect of obtaining it should not become in itself an inducement to dishonesty, as it certainly is at present. That things are as they are seems to me largely due to the fact that the punishment of the fraudulent debtor must generally be paid for by the victimised creditor. It is too much to expect that business men who have been let in heavily by unscrupulous rogues will throw good money after bad for the purpose of making examples for the benefit of others, and there is the least possible justification for doing so in a case where the evil-doer has not only defrauded his neighbour, but is abusing the process of the Court. When the law offers its own machinery for the relief of honest debtors, the law may very well be expected to take all necessary precautions that dishonest debtors shall not get the benefit of its services.

I think, therefore, that not only should the definition of offences under the Bankruptcy Acts be extended, but that all the worst of such offences should be the subject of prosecution at the public expense; and I do not believe that the expense would amount to much, for the knowledge that prosecution is certain, or even probable, would be quite sufficient to deter the majority of the present offenders. They are not of the deliberately lawless class, but are tempted to dishonest courses by the knowledge that prosecution is neither certain nor probable. From what Mr. Lloyd-George has done and said since he has been in office, I suppose we may take it that a new Bankruptcy Bill will be on the programme for this session, and I trust that this aspect of the question will be adequately dealt with in it.

"The Philanderer," at the Court.

One of the disadvantages of success is that the fierce light of publicity is apt to be thrown upon work that falls far behind the achievement of later years. Yet I was not among those who were wearied by the performance of this early work by Mr. Bernard Shaw. The sparkle of parts of the dialogue helped to carry one over the arid tracts, and I was pleased reminiscently with the humours of the Ibsen Club in Cork-street, where one heard an echo of theories rife in the early nineties, illustrated with a bust of Ibsen. Then in that most improbable parent, Colonel Daniel Craven, one had the pleasure of admiring the suave excellence of Mr. Eric Lewis, a comedian of whom it may in truth be said that he adorns whatever he touches. Mr. Ben Webster had the ungrateful task of rendering the philanderer himself, and it taxed his powers to present us with a full-length portrait of this very unsympathetic young man that should be faithful to the intentions of the author, and yet not too repulsive to the audience. Here and there, as in the last act, when things are going badly with the philanderer, Mr. Ben Webster showed traces of Mr. Granville Barker's influence in his attitudes upon the sofa and the fall of his face. But I liked his performance, which was certainly somewhat of an artistic achievement, seeing that the character of the philanderer lies outside the temperament of Mr. Ben Webster. Miss Barton, understudy of Miss Lilian McCarthy (indisposed), played the part of the ebullient Julia Craven with a perfect comprehension of its vagaries that was pleasure to behold.

The audience was mildly approbative, and at the fall of the curtain dispersed without any violent demonstration in Mr. Shaw's honour. What I feel about the play is that it is a happy early attempt in a vein that Mr. Shaw has since probed to depths of richness, of which the nuggets strewn sparsely through the text indicated in the early nineties a possibility. But, as in the case of gold mining, a rich surface deposit does not mean that the mine carries rich ore at depth. Mr. Shaw's does, however, and has brought its unique shareholder many rich dividends in money and renown.

At the Royalty Theatre, during the past week, the most attractive of the plays appeared to me to be the "Mariage de Figaro," of Beaumarchais. M. Georges Berr did not disappoint the favourable opinion I had formed of him on the two or three occasions I had witnessed his work at the Théâtre Français, of which august institution he is an associate. As that subtle knave Figaro, M. Berr was mercurial and armed at all points against the many dangers of ruining himself in his master's reputation. M. Berr brought out with clearness that hatred and contempt of the nobility, which was so much in the minds of many literary men in France at the time of the Revolution. He had a way of pronouncing the word canaille which in itself was almost a characterisation of the epoch of revolution which dates the play. Mlle. Bertiny, also an associate, filled the part of Suzanne, beloved of the Marquis, the betrothed of Figaro, and she, too, gave a fine rendering of Beaumarchais's spirited dialogue. The Cherubin of Mlle. Eva Linay was also an attractive impersonation, and the other players were adequate, with the exception of the judge, whose utterance was all too extraordinary to have been human speech, even in the artificial eighteenth century. But I dare say that there is some old tradition of how to intone this part, at the Comédie Française, which weighs with all its weight upon those who attempt it now.

Mlle. Jeanne Granier is with us this week, and those who can and are above the age of, say, fourteen, should visit the Royalty while she is playing. "Education de Prince," of M. Maurice Donnay, a great Parisian success, fills the programme for this week, and the education of the heir to the Silistrian throne at the hands of the Parisians will afford much delight to all those who are attracted by charm of style—for M. Maurice Donnay has style—and can enjoy a delicate subject delicately handled.

It is a curious thing to observe how one "mystery" begets its fellow, and the performance of the two Howards at the Palace Theatre challenges that of the Zancigs. Whether the detection of the Muswell Hill murderers was due to the statement of one of these brothers, as has been maintained, I do not know. But in any case the application of the "silent test," as these brethren term the silence which precedes the identification by the one brother of the objects seen by the other, is certainly a marvellous feat. If done by code, it must be by "silent code" and well deserves to be witnessed by all who are interested in telepathy versus human ingenuity.

By the bye, Mr. Hayden Coffin is to make his first appearance as a variety artist at the Palace Theatre on the 17th of this month.

"Amasis," crowned with the success of two hundred nights, now proceeds to visit the chief provincial towns, where doubtless the bright laurels of the country will lie beside the dusty but much sought after laurels of London town. Miss Drever, who scored a great success when she appeared at the Savoy Theatre, now plays the title rôle, formerly the part of Miss Ruth Vincent. "The Scarlet Pimpernel" now blossoms afresh at the New Theatre—afresh with the eternity of four hundred and fifty nights behind it.

At the Vaudeville Theatre I spent a very pleasant evening at the close of last week. The occasion of my visit to this, the cosiest and most home-like of little theatres, was the new version of that "Belle of Mayfair," which has for so long delighted its special public. There that same public was packed happily together and drinking in with eyes and ears those malapropos which are now strewn more than ever thickly in the way of Mr. Arthur Williams, that delightful comedian. He and Mr. Pounds, Mr. Farren Soutar, and Mr. Angelo, seemed to have established yet more excellent relations with the audience, which gave me the impression of knowing exactly what each was going to do and being ravished when he did it. Mr. Sam Walsh comes out nimble, not to say athletic, in this new version, and danced both well and wildly to the tune of "Military Mad," a new song which he vociferates amid thunders of applause. Among the ladies, in the absence of Miss Camille Clifford, Miss Ruby Ray is in evidence in her flirtations with Mr. Angelo, culminating in the pretty new song, "The French and English Maid." Mr. Courtice Pounds gives us melody and mockery as he sings the new song "Do you Waltz?" and reverses in the reverse of the right way with several ladies. The New Double Sextet is a formidable affair, and youth and beauty have much to say to its success. I liked Miss Boyd's new song with its dose of worldly wisdom, "If you must sigh," and Miss Billie Burke trills her new ditties with the charm of the porcelain shepherdess that she is, besides playing the comedy of her part with grace and lightness of touch. Mr. Leslie Stuart's music is ever stimulating, and well suited to this sort of production, which has all the vagary and irresponsibility of the average musical comedy without a trace of offensive suggestion, or, what is even worse, a moment of boredom, in its course. It disarms; it pleases by its very unpretentiousness. I shall probably go there again some months hence.

The management of the Hippodrome send me a daintily-bound little green book, containing the adventures of "The Treasure Ship in Fairy Seas," told and illustrated in colour. I have already said my brief say about that performance, but it may be worth while mentioning that there is a new series of "singing pictures" on the chronomegaphone—what a noisy word!—and that new acrobats, a new magician, and a clown of extraordinary eloquence now adorn the programme of this house of Proteus.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE STAGE AND ROYALTY.

THE King and Queen have left Paris with the reputation of forming "un ménage tout à fait aimable et très uni." They went everywhere together, to restaurant déjeuner and dinner parties, to church on Sunday, to the Elysée, to motor in the Bois, pay visits, and generally to the theatre, the exception being when the King wanted to see "Rien à declarer, Messieurs"—a decidedly risky piece—in the Palais Royal or the Passage de Choiseul spirit. It brims over with clever fun. The Queen, on her side, went to witness "Ma Femme Josette," which is also charmingly clever and not too recklessly spicy. At Sarah Bernhardt's theatre the King laughed too heartily for his sides not to have ached. He never, he said, enjoyed any play more than "Les Bouffons," which was on there. When Prince of Wales, he used to go behind the scenes to give the stimulant of praise to players and author. This time, as he had come both as un bon mari and a great King, he had them summoned to his box, which gave the Queen an opportunity to add a gracious word and to satisfy her curiosity. Zamacoïs, the author of "Les Bouffons," speaks of the evening spent by their Majesties at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre as la plus belle soirée in his own life. His prenom is Miguel, and he belongs to an artistic Spanish family. You may remember the mark Zamacoïs made at the Salon with "L'Education d'un Prince," the "Prince" being Alfonso XII. A vein of very amusing irony ran through this painting. One finds a similar one in "Les Bouffons." This is a case for saying "bon chien chasse de race."

Whenever their Majesties had decided at luncheon hour to spend the evening at any particular theatre, they sent word to the manager and intimated their desire for privacy. This prevented their being used as an advertisement, and enabled them to go in quietly and to go out with comparative quietness, for the public, which is now greatly provincialised, rushed to view the departure. Facilities for travelling, and the Government being greatly in the hands of provincial deputies and senators, provincialise Paris, and not always to its advantage.

The theatres managed by actresses may have never heard of the proof Lord Stair gave Louis XIV. of his excellent breeding. Though privacy had been required, they made a preliminary fuss which gave more publicity than was wished for to the Royal intention. True politeness would have been to have closely followed the message received from the person acting as the mouthpiece of their Majesties. The official stamp was hastily given by Mmes. Réjane and Sarah Bernhardt to the stage boxes their Majesties asked for. Sarah called attention to their presence, which otherwise might have been unperceived, by draping the front of their box with crimson satin and placing ushers in the corridor at the entrance to their avant scène. Mme. Réjane, who has, or has had, the wealth of Chili behind her, and is now mistress of a most sumptuously comfortable theatre, hung out a similar drapery in buttercup-yellow satin. She even ran up in the corridor at the back of the stage box a dainty salon for the queen and a fumoir for the King. The more amiable a king is in his personal relations the more inclined we should be to respect his wishes. When he is at once constitutional and desirous of scattering contentment around, his wish should be more than ever law in things social. The easy yoke of such despotism is the recompense for his respect of our liberties. But teach this, if you can, to stage Queens!

"Les Bouffons" is a conte, or lay, or old story, broken up into rhymed dialogues of endless variety. The rhyme is sometimes doggerel, as in the interlude in a "Midsummer Night's Dream," sometimes in versification that reminds one of André Chenier, and sometimes might, one imagines, match with nocturnes of Chopin. A French audience revels in good verses, and those of Zamacoïs, as rendered by Sarah Bernhardt, have been received with admiration nothing short of enthusiastic. The story is this:—Baron de Mautpré, an old-time nobleman who lived towards the end of the fifteenth century, or quite early in the sixteenth, has reason to complain of the march of civilisation and the formation of a King's gendarmerie which prevents him swooping down on merchants who pass through the gorge below his high-perched castle. They can even venture to ascend to his ancestral stronghold to give the news of the country they have passed through, or of the Court on the Loire, where they have so many royal and other brilliant customers. The castle is almost in ruins for want of money to repair it, the baroness is long dead, and the châtelaine is Mlle. Solange, the only daughter of the house. She is a Miss Ravenswood without any tendency towards black tragedy. The retainers are Ollivier; a Maître Jacques, or rather a parallel for Caleb, the old servant at Wolf's Crag; three men in liveries worn almost to rags; Dame Nicole, the cook; a doctor, who looks a necromancer; Volcano, an old Italian free lance; Baroco, his Florentine compatriot, also free lance, and born buffoon. The old and the younger Italian, the King's gendarmerie having left them nothing to do, have stuck limpet fashion to the Baron and his castle. Then there are in the way of clownish characters, Jeannot, a villager who is a shrewd rustic and can improvise a funny song or lay against no matter what other rustic bard; Hilaire, a poor woebegone creature, and the bell-ringer. The scenery is marvellously striking and almost mediæval. It undergoes seven shiftings, which are accomplished with the smooth rapidness of "greased lightning." Excuse this Americanism. It is so apposite that I yield to the temptation of using it.

Solange has traditional claims to be counted an heiress. The Baron cannot rid himself of the delusion that he has not eaten into her heritage too often for any of it to remain. Maître Ollivier, as a faithful retainer, is devoted to her, and turns over her matrimonial prospects in his mind seriously and often. She has so far enjoyed in fancy free her life in the half-ruined castle. But she awakes suddenly on hearing from wandering merchants accounts of the outer world. She is curious to form an idea for herself of the balls, hunts, and excursions by land and water, which are got up for the pleasure of Court ladies. At this point of the play Ollivier comes to tell her that two young noblemen have entered the castle disguised as aides of the merchants. Their real object is to try her sapience at a Court of Love, at which each will try to win her highest regard. The one who has taken the name of Narcisse is not exactly a dunce, but handsome and wears rich clothes. The other, who takes the name of Jacasse (or the talkative fellow) is brilliantly clever but deformed. They want to see whether talent or good looks goes farthest in a contest for the heart of a fair lady. Solange is vastly interested, but foresees her father's veto to any proposal for a Court of Love contest. Ollivier advises her to feign illness and go to bed. This she does. The doctor comes to see her, but cannot understand the case. Ollivier, knowing better, tells the Baron that his lovely Solange is simply dying of tedium, and needs a more exciting life. He proposes by way of a nice ladylike amusement a poetic tournament, and tells of the poetic talents he has discovered in the two aides of the merchant. Why not allow them to compete with Baroco, Jeannot, Hilaire, and Volcano? The Baron consents. He also, from a sense of fairness to the poets, prolongs the trial of skill for a month. During this time Narcisse and Jacasse will remain his guests in the castle.

Each poet remains in his character, Volcano as the hard-drinking and impulsive free lance, Baroco as an Italian buffoon tumultuously gay, intriguing, crafty, and great fun, Jeannot and Hilaire as rustics, and Narcisse as a rather heavy beau. In the opening scene of the Court of Love Mme. Sarah Bernhardt declaims in doggerel and sometimes in queerly turned strophes madly absurd, grotesque as the old gargoyles in the courtyard, and good at best for la Fête des Fous. The lay has ear-tickling charm, but not a ghost of reason. Why should it? We are in a realm of pure fancy. The Baron is bewildered at all that passes, and lets things drift. Jacasse does not at once cast aside the hump that is hidden in the capat, or little mantle. He can translate to Solange in poetic language the sad sighing of the wind through the crevices in the old tower. Still better can he convey to her a message from the zephyr which yesterday played in her ringlets. His concetti are delicious, and are even enchanting to a young lady brought up in solitary state in an antique castle. In the act with a moonlight scene his poetry is a melodious nocturne. He comes suddenly forward as Solange confesses her love and owns to herself the sorcery of genius. Her heart is more open to attack from the gifted poet, however deformed, than to that of the self-admiring Narcisse. All you see ends as it ought to, and in a love story. The extravagance of the whole thing is one of its highest charms. It lifts for a while above the prose of real life.

French society is in its whole feeling and thought as heartily clerical as French statecraft is—and has been, despite appearances, ever since the thirteenth century—thoroughly anti-clerical. French society has decreed that the important part of the marriage ceremony is at the church, the legal marriage at the town hall being more or less—so it thinks—a pestilential and atheistic form and circumstance. And I can see no other reason for this view than the old rivalry between the Church and the civil power. French law forbids any priest from going through the marriage ceremony without satisfying himself that the legal knot has been tied by a mayor. The priest, unable to ignore the law totally, nevertheless makes a point of addressing the bride as "mademoiselle," although she is legally "madame."

The marriage of Mlle. Thomson, the pretty daughter of the Minister of Marine, was, therefore, not a fashionable marriage—the invitations were for the Neuilly Town Hall—but it was one of the prettiest I have seen. With Republican simplicity, M. Fallières came as a witness along with M. Loubet, who carries off with perfect grace his position of President-Dowager without a jointure.

The town hall of Neuilly is a modern building in the Renaissance style, standing upon a square and enclosed on three sides by streets. It is one of the handsomest public buildings I know in or around Paris—airy, dignified, and palatial. The gay colours of the frescoes were enhanced by a profusion of flowers and by the glitter of naval and military uniforms. On this occasion the navy was evidently the senior service. Not five years ago the borough of Neuilly was a Nationalist stronghold. It witnessed the birth of Boulangism, engineered in Count Dillon's house, and recently the suicide of Syveton. Neuilly has now changed its political complexion, and all its municipal councillors met M. Fallières at the door and were presented to him.

There was a Protestant ceremony afterwards at the Admiralty, conducted by Pastor Wagner, a man of liberal views. Why not at a Protestant place of worship? Evidently to show that it was a purely private affair in no wise connected with the new legal status of the bride and bridegroom, M. Thomson thus carries the separation of Church and State into his own family circle. I am not aware that either his or the bridegroom's family are Protestants. In France many people who have practically left the Catholic Church would nevertheless regard a civil marriage as "unlucky." In such cases, a pastor of liberal views is asked to give a blessing, which gives a touch of spirituality to the ceremony while leaving consciences free.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

MAN, dear Lady Betty, was the bread-winner; now he is the bread-and-blouse winner.

At the moment our women appear to attach more importance to the latter than to the former. "Less children and more dresses," "Less affection and more admiration," "Let me have the home on my back," are the controlling thoughts in the mind of most Englishwomen of this generation. It is not commercial competition that is affecting us so seriously, as the clothes war among women.

This is the Age of the Linendraper's Venus.

There are hundreds of thousands of "Bargain-made" beauties to-day.

A Boucher John Bull is a ridiculous object; nevertheless, our fellow-countrymen and women are rapidly developing the character. "Lightness; lighter still; again still lighter," is the cry in every direction here. In Parliament, only those speeches are attended to that are copiously sprinkled with "Laughter" and "Loud laughter"; in the German Reichstag, the French Chamber, or the United States' Congress, argument and earnestness prevail. The popular preacher here endeavours to provide soufflé sermons to obtain an increased congregation; the experienced writer conceals his sense in nonsense; sentiment is almost driven from the stage; wit and wisdom are the Scylla and Charybdis of modern English conversation—only the smallest of small-talk pleases; and art struggles to be a kind of suburban Louis Seize. Morality is a combination of Marie Antoinette and Mayfair; it has the vices of both without having the virtues of either. The Boucher John Bull in a blouse trimmed with bows and a chaplet on his head is an appropriate shepherd to a suffragette shepherdess. Has any previous generation produced so ridiculous a national caricature?

* * * * *

The Sorrows of "Society" in England at the moment are peculiar. There are amongst us some who have "position" without having the money with which to keep it up, and there are others who have the money but are without the "position." Out of that condition has developed a process of exchange; the one provides the "position," and the others repay them for their services with money, and each, in endeavouring to attain their particular object, does much that is unbecoming and even unprincipled. The transaction, however, has, necessarily, to be carried on surreptitiously. Those who have the "position" assure the world that the Midas and his family who are in their charge are altogether remarkable, that they are unworldly, generous, most scrupulously honest, and charming beyond compare; and Midas and his family have the same tale to tell of them in return. In due course Midas has established himself and his, and has no more need of his social pilots. Then an altogether different tale is told by both. "They are terrible people; totally uneducated and unprincipled, and without a spark of generosity," say their former pilots. "Sharks and blackmailers," say the others. "The husband is deeply indebted to mine, and I have showered kindnesses on the rest of the family!" In nine cases out of ten that situation is eventually reached. Nevertheless, Midas and his have meanwhile attained the position and retained their wealth, and have altogether the best of the transaction. On the other hand, the social pilots have obtained just sufficient assistance to tide over the difficulties of the moment, and no more, and are in as bad a condition as they were before. The process of social reversal, however, has been considerably advanced. Midas has his peerage, is established in "society" and in the country, is a power in politics, and is unassailable; the "pilots" have descended to a lower social level than they previously occupied. Never was there a time before when our "society" was so full of complaints of the "ingratitude" of those who have received benefits, of the "worldliness" of the rich and successful, of the "treachery" of friends, of the "unscrupulousness" of others, and of the "misrepresentations" of all! The rival "pilots" hate each other and most of their respective rich "friends" of the past; and the latter have the greatest contempt for the former. Pleasure never thrives on such a hot-bed of hate.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

SOME of the papers are constantly printing distracted yelpings calling upon the Jockey Club to arise and defend "racing" from the attacks with which that sport is alleged to be threatened. These melancholy gallimaufrys are, of course, regarded with mingled derision and contempt by the members of the Jockey Club, who recognise the enormous difference between an attempt to suppress street betting, and tipsters' advertisements and starting price establishments (which last are the greatest curse to the Turf at the present time), and an attack upon racing itself, which has never been contemplated in any responsible quarter. It surely cannot be maintained, even by the most hopelessly asinine and anserous of these alarmists, that street betting and analogous evils are intrinsic and essential elements of racing. The screeching writers to whom I refer appear to be deeply sunk in muddy darkness, for they cannot suppose (if they are endowed with a quarter of a grain of common sense) that the Jockey Club is likely to commence a foolish and futile agitation against the Street Betting Act, considering that when that measure was passing through Parliament not one syllable was uttered against it by any member of the Club. In the House of Lords the numerous Peers who are members of the Jockey Club either absented themselves during the progress of the Bill, or they sat as mute as mackerel. There was no opposition worthy the name. As to the proposal, now constantly brought forward, that bookmakers should be licensed, this is mere mountebank's cackle, for the moon will assuredly fall before Parliament recognises betting in any sort of way whatever. Why cannot sporting writers recognise hard facts, which are flagrantly apparent to every one else?

One of the daily papers, in a notice of the death of Lady Hastings, stated that her first husband was "driven to suicide" by losses on the Turf, and this fiction has been extensively copied. This tale is utterly untrue, and it is most discreditable that such an objectionable fabrication should have been printed without the slightest pains having been taken to ascertain the real facts. Lord Hastings, who had a miserably weak constitution, died after a long illness. So far was he from being a ruined man at the time of his death, that he left personal property to the net value of over £90,000. Lord Hastings' difficulties were more due to excessive "all-round" extravagance than to losses on the Turf. Shrewd men of business who were well acquainted with his private affairs were decidedly of the opinion that he lost very little money on the Turf, putting aside the Hermit catastrophe, which was simply a manifestation of the most crackbrained folly. There was a lot of cackling and braying over the disastrous results of Lord Hastings' Turf career by a herd of geese who knew nothing about him, except the trash which they had read in the papers, and who were unaware of his large winnings on many occasions. Lord Hastings cleared about £110,000 by two handicap coups, Ackworth's Cambridgeshire and Lecturer's Cesarewitch. He was an excellent judge of racing, and he would have done well on the Turf but for the fatal blunder of laying huge sums against a horse merely through a personal prejudice. I believe, however, that more than half of the losses over Hermit were recovered a fortnight later at Ascot. Lord Hastings lost heavily by the defeat of Lady Elizabeth in the Middle Park Plate of 1867, and he was £20,000 to the bad through her defeat by Julius in a match, which race, by the way, was said to have ruined the filly. The Sporting Times is wrong in stating that Lord Hastings' income was "under £18,000" a year. He had fully double that amount. There were large and valuable estates in Ayrshire, Derbyshire, and Leicestershire; and when he came of age there was a very considerable sum of ready money, the savings of his minority.

Lord Hastings' embarrassments were cleared off by the kindness of his cousin, the late Lord Bute, and he purchased the Loudoun Castle estate in Ayrshire from him for £300,000 early in 1868. Lord Bute had no use for this property, and he merely bought it in order to oblige his cousin, so a few years later Loudoun was transferred to the late Lord Donington (the brother-in-law of Lord Hastings), and it now belongs to his son, Lord Loudoun. Lord Bute, who was full of generosity and chivalry, offered to place at Lord Hastings' disposal any sum which might be necessary to put him at ease.

I hear that Keystone II. will be trained for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap. Heavy weights have frequently distinguished themselves in this race, but Lord Derby's mare has certainly not been favoured by the handicapper, as (including the sex allowance) she has 1 lb. the worst of the weights with Velocity, and she has to give 18 lb. to Gingal. The St. Leger running has been entirely ignored. At Doncaster Prince William gave 3 lb. to Keystone II., and finished in front of her. In this handicap the mare is made to give a stone to Mr. J. B. Joel's horse, so that she has 17 lb. the worst of the weights on the St. Leger form, but it is quite certain that Keystone II. ought to have won the St. Leger easily.

My Pet II. has left Newmarket for France, and I fancy that Mr. Raphael will discover a few months hence that he committed an immense blunder in deciding not to start his colt for the Two Thousand, but to reserve him for his French engagements. It is highly probable that the French three-year-old stakes will "take more winning" next season than will either the Two Thousand or the Derby. My Pet II. is a nice racing-like colt, but I am informed that he has not grown since last season. I see it stated that the withdrawal of My Pet II. leaves the Two Thousand "a good thing" for Slieve Gallion, which opinion seems to me to be all nonsense and rubbish. Captain Greer's colt will have to beat a large field on May 1, as the list of probable starters for the Two Thousand includes Mr. Bailey's All Black, Mr. W. Clarke's Linacre, Lord Derby's Olympian, Mr. E. Dresden's Galleot, Sir R. Waldie Griffith's Simon Square, Lord Rosebery's Bezonian, Lord Wolverton's Larig, Major Loder's Baltinglass, Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller, and Mr. W. Hall Walker's Knight of Tully. These represent the best of the public lot, but there is also a considerable and formidable dark contingent, including his Majesty's Perambulator, by Persimmon out of Spyglass; M. E. Blanc's Vichy, by Cyllene out of Vicuna; Lord Falmouth's St. Martin, own brother to Quintessence; Lord Howard de Walden's Cargill, by Carbine out of Galinne; Mr. S. Joel's Portsmouth, by Persimmon out of Mediation; Sir E. Vincent's Charles Edward, by Avington out of Portree; and Mr. G. H. Freeman's Merry Fox, by Flying Fox out of Flower of Wit, whose only distinction up to the present time lies in the fact that he cost 5,000 gs. as a yearling. This colt, who was bred at Sledmere by Sir Tatton Sykes, forfeited sixteen engagements last season, and he has still over twenty to fulfil. Cargill commenced last season with thirty-nine engagements, and Perambulator was entered for thirty-eight races. These animals must have been all well thought of as yearlings. The Duke of Portland is said to have a promising colt in Apponyi, by St. Simon out of Mneme, who was very backward when he ran at Newmarket last autumn.

Slieve Gallion has been left in for the Union Jack Stakes at Liverpool, which race is run on the first day of the Spring Meeting, but I am informed that there is now no intention of starting him at Aintree. Captain Greer would be very badly advised if he pulled out Slieve Gallion before the Two Thousand, and in the Liverpool race his colt would have to carry a penalty of 8 lbs., so that he would have to give 15 lbs. to horses which have never won £300 at one time, of which there are several in the entry.

If St. Martin can be got fit by the middle of April, Lord Falmouth's much-talked-of colt will probably make his début in the Newmarket Biennial, instead of being reserved for the Two Thousand. Of course, if St.

Martin is really a Derby colt he will win the Biennial in a canter, as he would have the benefit of a 7 lbs. maiden allowance. The best public form in the Biennial is represented by Simon Square (5 lbs. extra) now that My Pet II. has gone to France, and by Weathercock, but (as I have already stated) Major Loder's colt is not likely to be in anything like form until late in the season. The Kingsclere stable might be represented in the Biennial by the Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller, who was twice beaten last autumn when running in good company, but he was then backward. Dusty Miller is quite likely to improve from two years old to three as much as did his relative Troutbeck. Supposing that he is not quite up to Two Thousand and Derby form he may yet be well worth looking after at Ascot, where he is engaged in the Prince of Wales's Stakes and in the Hardwicke Stakes.

My Pet II. is not now likely to be raced in England this year, even during the latter part of the season, as his only engagement after Ascot (where he is entered for the Ascot Derby) is the Liverpool St. Leger in November. As the Grand Prix is run this year on Sunday in Ascot week, there is not much chance of Mr. Raphael's colt fulfilling his English engagement. If My Pet II. does well in France, and proves himself to be a stayer, it may be hoped that he will be entered for the Doncaster Cup and for the Jockey Club Cup. This colt is nominated for the Grand Prix by his breeder, Mme. Henry Say. The French entry for this rich stake of course includes all their best colts and fillies, and the pick of the English lot are Linacre, Olympian, Galvani, Baltinglass, Hexagon, and Knight of Tully.

I see it is asserted by an infatuated doodle that the Lincolnshire Handicap is spoilt by Kaffir Chief, who has "only 7 st. 8 lb." to carry, although this horse finished second for the Cambridgeshire with 6 st. 10 lb., when there was a field of eighteen behind him. The fact is overlooked that Polymelus, who won in a common canter, was giving 2 st. to Kaffir Chief, and any one who believes that Mr. Barnard's horse is a good thing at Lincoln would expect Polymelus to win there with about 11 st. When Kaffir Chief ran prominently at Newmarket he finished only a neck in front of Malua, who was giving him a year and 18 lb. I do not think that there would be any rush to back Malua for the Lincoln race with (say) 8 st. 13 lb. on his back.

Very few of the horses which have been so prematurely rushed in the Lincoln betting are likely to be fit at the opening of the season. The speculation about which so much elaborate noise is raised is of the most paltry nature, and there will not be any genuine market on the race for a month to come.

I see it is predicted that the three-year-olds will play a prominent part at Kempton Park. Meadow Rue will probably prove to be the best of them. I do not believe that either Polar Star or Sagamore will be brought out to run for the Jubilee Handicap, and Orwell will be put out of court by a penalty of 10 lb. if she has previously won the One Thousand, while if she has been beaten at Newmarket she will have no chance at Kempton Park.

The disappearance of Hack Watch is much to be regretted, from the sporting point of view, but his withdrawal from the Grand National Steeplechase has saved the handicapper from great difficulties. Ascetic's Silver, who won last year, has fairly earned the top weight, nor could the owner of John M.P. reasonably complain of the high place in the handicap which was awarded to his horse. Cinders was not harshly treated with 11 st. 10 lb., but the race would have been at her mercy if she had been kept for it, as in that case her weight would have been very much lighter. Aunt May and Timothy Titus are fairly handicapped on their best form. Wolf's Folly, who has a nice weight to carry, has been a great tip for the Aintree race, and his friends do not appear to be much disheartened by his recent defeat by Cissy's Revel at Sandown Park. It is maintained that the winner was thoroughly fit, but that the second was big, as well he might be if he is being trained with a view to his being in prime racing condition on March 22.

The King will be abroad when the Liverpool Spring Meeting takes place, but I hear that there is a possibility that the Prince of Wales may be at Aintree on the Grand National day, in which case H.R.H. is to stay at Knowsley with Lord Derby.

Dean Swift is favourite at the Continental lists for both the City and Suburban and the Lincolnshire Handicap. Last year this horse was second to Ob (beaten a head) with 7 st. 11 lb. at Lincoln, while he won easily at Epsom with 7 st. 11 lb. Dean Swift does not require a severe course of training, and he is one of the few horses in the Lincoln race that is likely to be quite fit. He is not overweighted with 8 st. 6 lb., considering the moderate class of the probable starters, but he ought not to be able to give 20 lb. to Camisard, if the French horse is worth keeping in training.

At the lists Slieve Gallion is favourite for the Derby at 3 to 1, and next comes Galvani at 4 to 1. It is inconceivable that anyone suffered to be at large would accept such odds at the present time. Slieve Gallion will, of course, start for the Two Thousand, and Galvani may not turn out to be Major Loder's best three-year-old at the finish. Who ever mentioned Spearmint in connection with the Derby this time twelve months? It is strange to find Olympian third favourite at 10 to 1, while the price of Ouadi Halfa is only 12 to 1, although double those odds were laid recently in London against M. E. Blanc's colt. It will be full time to think seriously about Ouadi Halfa when it is known that his owner has decided to start him at Epsom. The most remarkable feature in the Derby list, however, is Traquair at 14 to 1. I do not think that any sound judge of horses and racing would be disposed to accept 100 to 1 about Lord Rosebery's colt, and if the Derby falls to this stable the winner will be Bezonian, but I shall be surprised if he turns out to be up to the best form of the year, although he ought to prove very useful if all goes well with him. Olympian is not likely to show to advantage over the Epsom course, and Lord Derby's colt is far more likely to win the Two Thousand or the Newmarket Stakes than the Derby. Ascot is a course which would just suit Olympian.

There appear to have been some tiresome tracasseries in connection with the future mastership of the hunt which has been long known as Lord Galway's. It was expected that Lord Charles Bentinck would be the new master, but he has withdrawn his name, in deference to the wish of his half-brother, the Duke of Portland. It is now understood that Lord Fitzwilliam will be the new master, and that Lord Charles Bentinck will remain in the Blankney country.

THE AMENITIES OF HOCKEY.

Mr. J. E. Gardiner is vice-captain of the Devon Hockey Club. He has captained and played for Devon more often than any one else. So he says, and I feel sure no one who has read his extraordinary letter to the press will care to dispute his assertion or be anxious to play against him. He is very furious with the Somerset men for putting off the county match owing to the frost. They ought to have gone to Teignmouth, and they judged the condition of that ground by the state of the ground at Wellington. If this were so one would think that the Somerset men were deserving of censure. But according to the writer the real reason was that Dorset had routed Somerset on a frosty ground. Devon had defeated Dorset. Devon had a stronger team against a weakened Somerset eleven, and sooner than be beaten for the first time by Devon, Somerset backed out of the match. The writer goes on to compare the effeminacy of his opponents with the more robust character of the Somerset ladies. If the return game is played, Devon he remarks, may agree to have no dangerous players, use a soft ball, and allow Somerset to wear American football armour and have the ground saturated. The point of this vulgarity is that the writer says that win or lose Devonians are sportsmen. "Against Somerset this year we started with ten men and ended up with four players maimed." In conclusion Mr. Gardiner says that he trusts the precedent of scratching will not be copied, for the sake of hockey. I have been asked what I think about the affair. It seems to me that any hockey player would be entirely justified in making any excuse to avoid playing against a man who can write such a letter. If any game requires self-control on the part of the player it is hockey. Devon men are no doubt sportsmen, and I have no hesitation in saying that they will regard Mr. Gardiner's letter as exhibiting mental conditions precisely opposite to those which one expects to find in any man who desires to be considered as a sportsman. It is a letter of vulgar innuendo and scurrilous abuse. Mr. Gardiner has mistaken his vocation. He should become a pamphleteer for the Municipal Reformers in the present contest for the London County Council.

Hitherto hockey has been regarded as a game played by gentlemen. These unpleasant revelations from the West show that there are some who have as little regard for their own reputation as they have for the decency of the game. I sincerely trust that Mr. Gardiner's precedent will not be copied. For the sake of hockey—especially of Devon hockey—I hope he will see that the only course open to him is to resign his vice-captaincy. A man who can publish such a letter is quite unfit to be a county official. If every word he says as to the ostensible reason for scratching were true, and for the purpose of my observations I do not doubt a single word, he has utterly spoiled his case and ruined his cause by his malevolent remarks. If Somerset ever plays Devon again that county will have a right to ask that Mr. Gardiner should not be in the team.

After this ebullition of wrath on paper, I am not surprised to read in another journal that in another county match—that between Derbyshire and Notts—a player was ordered off the field. The referee was quite right to be very firm in the matter. Hockey is, to my mind, a far more dangerous game than either Rugby or Association football. A hockey stick is a dangerous implement, and the ball is not hollow. Of course, one has foreseen that with the popularity of the game such incidents as in this county match were bound to arise. Rough play must be tackled with severity. There must be no nonsense about suspending a player. If it is necessary for the good of the game the affiliation of clubs must be compulsory. The Hockey Association will no doubt move with the times. The Council has always done so. From what I know of the members of that Council no one will regret more than they will the extraordinary effusion of Mr. Gardiner. Neither football nor cricket has ever been disgraced in that way.

Mr. A. Wallis Myers is a well-known writer on lawn tennis subjects. He is very upset with some criticisms in the Referee, which, as the writer of Sporting Notions kindly points out, were originated by what I wrote about the trade and pot hunters. Mr. Myers says that the success of tournaments no more depends on the bounty of manufacturers than the success of the final of the Cup tie on the bounty of the makers of football. Then all I can say is that Edgbaston, Liverpool, and other large towns he named, should pay the full market price for their goods and follow the example of Wimbledon. Will Mr. Myers explains why Mr. MacFie brought forward his proposition that six shillings a dozen, less a royalty of ninepence a dozen to the association, should be paid for balls if the game does not depend on trade subvention?

Australasia, that is New Zealand and Australia combined, will challenge for the Dwight Davis Bowl this summer. There will be plenty of interest for lawn tennis players. The probable team will be Brookes and Wilding, who combine admirably, and Heath and Dr. Sharp. Brookes has beaten Wilding in the Singles Championship of Victoria, so that he must be as good as he was two years ago. Sharp is said to be a hard driver and good volleyer, and Heath is a very capable all-round player. No doubt the Americans will challenge as well. As for the home team, we may be serenely confident that the best possibly players will be selected, for on the Selection Committee of L.T.A. there is not a player who has ever been good enough to take part in any of these events. They are therefore as critical as they are impartial.

Mr. J. C. Clegg has resigned his position as Chairman of the Council of the Football Association. He has occupied this position for many years. The cause is the resolution of the Council rescinding the one that has caused all the trouble with the amateurs. In a column eulogy in the Express, Mr. C. E. Sutcliffe hopes the day will come when Mr. Clegg will resume the chair and the Council his policy. Never was there such a clear thinker or logically-minded man. I can only say that some of Mr. Clegg's remarks about amateurs have not struck me as being those of a logician or high thinker. His policy has been one of coercion. I may have to refer to this matter at greater length, and for the present I will only say that I cannot conceive Mr. Clegg as official receiver paying any attention to a resolution of a meeting of creditors if it were passed on the lines pursued at the meeting of the London Football Association.

Two more Southern clubs have fallen by the wayside in the struggle for the Football Cup. Luton went to Sunderland and, putting up a great game, they were beaten by a goal. Southampton were overwhelmed by Sheffield Wednesday, while Tottenham Hotspur, after extra time, quite failed to beat Blackburn Rovers. Crystal Palace again proved their worth as Cup-tie players by beating Fulham, and yet they failed in their Southern League match against a reserve team of the Hotspurs. In the First Division of the League Aston Villa simply overwhelmed Sheffield Wednesday by eight goals to one, and Chelsea, in the Second Division, although playing on their own ground, had to put up with defeat by Notts Forest, a result chiefly due to the brilliant goal keeping of Linacre.

The English Rugby team has met with another defeat. They went to Ireland and they were routed in the first half of the game, although they made a splendid rally afterwards. The Irish forwards are a splendid team. They are fast and rush grandly. These rushes were too much for the English halves and centre three-quarters. The days of midget half-backs are over, and Jago is certainly no good in such games. The Devon pair failed miserably. Their forwards got them the ball in the tight, but the Irish forwards swooped round so quickly that Jago took to blind passing, and Peters passed where he stood. Jackett at full back played superbly. The winners are a splendid team, and MacLear is playing a great game at three-quarter, but they badly want a good full back. Jackett was as good at getting England out of difficulties as his adversary was in getting his side into them.

Both the University crews have gone into strict training. Cambridge will go to Richmond and Oxford to Henley before putting in appearance at Putney. The Cambridge crew has been changed. Close-Brooks has gone to bow and Powell is at seven, with Johnstone at six, Shinewell, the heavy-weight, having gone out of the boat. The crew should be a good one, and Baynes has been given his Blue. I hope that bow, who also rowed against Harvard, may have the same good fortune.

By the way, in answer to a correspondent, I did not intend to say that the district round Putney could provide five eights for Thames and London. I wrote fine, but the printer willed otherwise.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

A NOTICEABLE feature of the motor business at the present time, upon which comment has more than once been made here, is the relative neglect by the leading makers of the small car. With few exceptions, all the better-known firms are devoting themselves exclusively to-day to the production of big and powerful cars selling at high prices, which naturally yield a bigger profit than the more modest article suited to the requirements of the automobilist of humble means. And in America apparently the same condition of things prevails. "A conspicuous feature of the recent show at New York," writes a correspondent of the Tribune, "was the absence of the usual array of small runabouts. Of the forty-odd exhibitors of gasoline cars, but three showed machines of this type—Cadillac, Oldsmobile, and Autocar. It is currently reported, further, that the two first-named have decided to discontinue their manufacture at an early date. Whether true or not, it is obvious that the larger cars are attracting by far the most attention." Would-be motorists waiting for the advent of that long-deferred boom in small, cheap cars must therefore still possess their souls in patience on both sides of the Atlantic.

Meanwhile, Mr. Jarrott is sending out particulars of a new small, light French car of which he has undertaken the agency in this country, which, according to his account of it, should certainly go some way to meet this particular want. The Duc d'Uzès is, it seems, interested in these cars, which are, we are told, fitted with single cylinder engines and characterised by great simplicity of design, as well as high efficiency. "I took one of the cars and used it for several days," says Mr. Jarrott, "and found it was possible to beat, for speed, any ordinary 12 h.p. or 15 h.p. car on the road, particularly up-hill. There was no undue vibration, and generally I was amazed at the extraordinary results I obtained." Mr. Jarrott adds: "I do not think that France is neglecting the small car business, but many brains are at work in evolving the right type of machine, and the car in question is certainly the most efficient small car I have ever tried." Further information on the subject will be awaited with interest, and should not be long delayed, seeing that Messrs. Jarrott and Letts have contracted for the delivery of one hundred of the new cars as soon as possible. It is said that the car in question is the Sizaire-Naudin, which was shown last year at the Agricultural Hall.

The Motor Union is doing good service by taking action in the matter of railway level crossings, and, while it is too much to hope for the abolition of all of those already in existence, the construction of new ones should certainly be interdicted. The dangers and inconveniences associated with level crossings are sufficiently well known, but motorists have more practical experience of them than most. A writer in one of the dailies has been citing well-known instances of such obstructions on main roads in country districts, but much worse are the cases of some still to be found within the metropolitan area. There is one which many will be familiar with at Mortlake, where the London and South-Western Railway crosses one of the principal streets in the most inconvenient and dangerous manner possible. Another which existed till recent years at Grove Park, Chiswick, has since been done away with on account of a bad accident which happened there a few years ago when a train ran into a 'bus. There is a third out Tottenham way at a God-forsaken little station rejoicing in the name of Park, and a fourth on the Tilbury and Southend line at Barking—the last being a particularly dangerous one since two branch lines join here, resulting in considerable traffic; and there are a quantity of sidings which utilise the crossing in addition. All such death-traps are an anachronism nowadays, and ought to be done away with. But our level crossings are nothing, of course, to those which they have in America where, as Mr. Rolls has recently been telling us, they are absolutely unguarded except by a warning board.

Mr. Filson Young has, in his capacity of guide, philosopher, and friend to budding motorists, more than once inculcated the desirability of considerate driving, and apart altogether from this fact, most motorists professing to guide public opinion have long since recognised the grievous harm done to the whole movement by selfish and inconsiderate drivers who disregard such counsel. It must have been with considerable surprise, therefore, that many read that in the course of a recent journey, made apparently for advertising purposes, from Cornwall to London on a well known 60 h.p. car, the motoring authority referred to drove it over one stretch of road at the rate of over 60 miles an hour; and what is even more surprising is, perhaps, that he should actually advertise the fact, or allow the firm in question to do this for him, in the press. Certainly it is impossible to reconcile such a proceeding with any genuine regard for the interests of automobilism as a whole. No doubt there will be plenty to make the most of the incident in course of the Session's debates in the House of Commons on the revision of the existing motor law.

That seems to be an interesting device for automatic gear changing which has been invented by Captain the Hon. Wm. Stanley, whose active interest in automobilism, like that of his elder brother, the Hon. Arthur Stanley, M.P., is well known. Detailed particulars have yet to be supplied, but briefly it would appear that, as the matter has been so far explained, the engine is fitted with a governor which, at certain speeds, brings into play a pawl mechanism, consisting of cams and levers, which operates to withdraw the clutch and effect the requisite gear changes as desired in accordance with the varying speeds of the engine as determined by the load. Captain Stanley claims that by his device the gears are changed automatically at exactly the right moment and without the slightest noise, that strains caused by bad driving are rendered impossible, and that the engine is kept running at its efficient rate under all conditions. Another ingenious automatic gear-changing device has recently been brought out in America in connection with the Sturtevant car.

A good deal of surprise, and not a little apprehension, was occasioned a short time since by a decision given in the courts in favour of a motor driver who, upon dismissal, had stuck to the leather motor-coat which had been provided by his master, and claimed it as his own. Obviously, the notion that a servant had the right to walk off, perhaps after a month's service, with a valuable livery provided by his master, was one quite at variance with the equity of the matter, and also with the established law as it had hitherto been laid down, and no little surprise at such an astonishing decision was accordingly expressed. Many will be glad to learn, therefore, from a lucid statement in a contemporary, how the matter actually stands. The case in question, it is explained, did not really raise the issue which was supposed at all, the sole point involved having been whether the driver had stolen the coat—that is to say, appropriated it with criminal intent—and the fact that the man was acquitted on this charge did not imply in the slightest degree that he was entitled to keep the garment, but merely that he had honestly believed that it belonged to him. As to the law on the larger issue, it has long been established that a servant's livery is his master's property, unless there is special understanding or agreement to the contrary, and this is plainly in accordance with common sense.

MAMMON.

Stock Markets Dull—The American Financial Position Still Restricting Business—Monetary Prospects—New York a Competitor for Bar Gold—Domestic Conditions Favourable—Good Trade Returns and Railway Dividends—Paris and the Income Tax Bill.

ALTHOUGH relieved from the vague fears of financial difficulties that disturbed it just recently, the Stock Exchange last week was not in a particularly bright mood. The unsatisfactory outlook for Americans is still restricting business all round the House, and although Yankee Rails have experienced a recovery of from 1 to 3 dollars since I last wrote the balance of probability points to the rally being succeeded by further liquidation. Satisfaction of a negative character may be derived from the fact that a large "Bear" account has lately been built up; it was mainly due to profit-taking by the "Bears" that the market took a turn for the better last week, and further rallies of a similar character may be expected to follow any fresh break. While, however, the "Bears" are to be welcomed as tending to regulate the market and prevent it getting out of hand, the monetary position in New York must still be looked to as affording the clue to the future level of prices. For the present interest rates are likely to keep firm, what with the outflow of money to the interior and the preparations being made by the banks to repay the $30,000,000 of Government deposits that Mr. Shaw requires before he goes out of office on March 4. This concerns the immediate future, but taking a broader view it is difficult to foresee any early return to cheap money on the other side, in view of the heaviness of Railroad borrowings. Following upon the extensive loans to which I referred a week ago, several other Companies have attempted to raise money upon short-dated notes, and two are credited with having to give 6 per cent. Recently attempts have been made, and with a certain amount of success, to place some of these short term notes with financiers in London and on the Continent. This circumstance has a very direct bearing upon the outlook for our own money and stock markets. A little while ago, when the joint stock banks were putting pressure upon Wall-street to take back stocks that had for months been carried here, and discrimination was made against American finance bills, some people predicted a speedy return to easy monetary conditions. Recent events must cause them to modify their anticipations. From the sound financial point of view it is good that the account carried here in Yankee Rails has been lightened, and that the volume of "kite" bills—which were sold to banks this side largely in order that Wall-street groups might continue to indulge their gambling propensities—has been reduced. But if in place of accommodation bills our banks and insurance Companies are going to load themselves up with Yankee short term bonds, the latter, desirable as they are from the point of view of investments, must tend to maintain the status quo in Lombard-street. Already the extension of credit granted by Europe has turned the exchanges again in favour of New York, and the United States is likely to continue a competitor of the Bank of England for the bar gold that arrives here from week to week on account of South Africa and other places. Were it not for New York there is little doubt that an immediate reduction in the Bank rate would be justified, for Threadneedle-street's reserve has already risen by six millions since the beginning of January, and, according to the last return, stands at nearly twenty-six millions, as compared with only twenty-three and three-quarter millions a year ago, when the official discount minimum was 4 per cent., against the 5 per cent. rate now ruling.

Romano's Restaurant, Strand.—Truth says:—"On the way down the Strand I dropped in to dine at Romano's—I was glad to see how well the place maintains its old reputation. A better-cooked and better-served dinner no one need desire, and this opinion is evidently shared by many, for the restaurant was packed, as it deserves to be."

In other respects the position at home gives rise to cheerful feelings. The Board of Trade returns for the first month of the year, showing an increase of 13 per cent. in imports and of nearly 14 per cent. in exports, furnish substantial proof of the activity ruling in the industrial and commercial world, and this must mean bigger profits for our manufacturers and traders, and a consequent growth in the surplus available for investment. Our railways, too, as the recent dividends demonstrated, have, on the whole, enjoyed an excellent half-year. For the present dear money is largely responsible for checking a revival in this market, but the high yields offered by the majority of stocks, and the fact that the dividends declared did not in many cases reflect the full extent of the enlarged earnings, owing to the additions made to reserves and carry-forwards, are facts that must tell favourably later on. Turning to the market for foreign securities, Internationals have lately been rather dull, in consequence more than anything else of the disturbance caused upon the Paris Bourse by the French Income Tax Bill. In some quarters it has been suggested that this measure, if adopted, may cause an exodus of capital from France, and that our own and other countries would reap the benefit. Such a statement, however, is altogether premature. The French people naturally do not take kindly to a tax on incomes, in which matter our own countrymen have a strong fellow-feeling, but the new imposts are not, to begin with, at any rate, very onerous, and our Gallic neighbours will no doubt grow used to them if they do not grow to like them by-and-by. The only Foreign bonds to show distinct weakness during the last few days have been Brazilians, and here the cause is undoubtedly connected with the Federal Government's recent attempts at raising a loan for coffee "valorisation"—a matter that appears to have caused friction between the Government and its European agents. Among Foreign Rails the stocks of the old Mexican Railway have been prominent owing to favourable earnings, but Argentines were dull owing to the minor political upset at San Juan, and to the capital issue announced by the Argentine Great Western. Grand Trunks have returned to popularity, the dividend of 3 per cent. on the Third Preference coming up to the best anticipations of the market. In another column I give reasons for the opinion that Trunk Thirds are one of the most likely purchases at present offering.

Sharp Movements in Home Rails—Break in Berths—The Traffic Question—Reassuring Statement by the Chairman—The North-Western and Great Western Dividends—Boards Adopt a Conservative Policy—Favourable North London Results.

What with the continued dearness of money and some further forced realisations, the Home Railway market during the greater part of last week presented a very woe-begone appearance. Except in one or two cases, it is doubtful if the actual sales were at all extensive, but as is inevitable in a narrow market, and one that, moreover, is out of fashion for the time being, the jobbers were not willing to put stock upon their books, and marked prices down accordingly. Towards the end of the week there were signs that the fall had been overdone. The dividend declared by the North-Western, while a keen disappointment to speculators, who had, and not unnaturally, looked for an increase, was recognised by the market on second thoughts as distinctly favourable to real holders. This Company, like a number of other leading lines, appears to have decided upon a more conservative policy in the matter of dividend distributions, and has taken advantage of the recent spell of trade prosperity to make provision for a rainy day. To a fair extent, of course, the advances in outgoings incurred by the Brum along with other leading Companies were due to circumstances over which the Boards had no control, such as the rise in the cost of labour and materials, but there has also been general evidence of a desire to expend more freely out of revenue upon upkeep, and to strengthen liquid reserves, and this must make for more stability in the matter of dividends. The recent movements in prices may be seen from the following table:—

In the Southern group, Brighton "A" provided something of a sensation by suddenly dropping from 116 to 111½. A prompt rally of a point or two followed, but even so the price still looks strangely low, especially remembering that five points are about to be deducted on account of dividend. The ostensible reason for the weakness was the publication of a traffic decrease of £5,400, representing more than 10 per cent. of the total weekly receipts, while there were also rumours—which fortunately are devoid of foundation—concerning a forthcoming capital issue. Another reason, and one which probably had most to do with the drop, was the pressure for sale of a large block of stock that had been temporarily "taken over" in connection with troubles arising out of the previous Account. On the question of the heavy falling off in receipts during January—amounting to over £10,000—Lord Cottesloe was able to partially reassure stockholders at the meeting last Wednesday. Tramway competition, while still admittedly severe, does not, it appears, account for anything like the reduction in earnings lately exhibited. The chief offender has been the weather, and his lordship referred to previous hard winters, when the takings of the line showed heavy decreases during January and February, but picked up immediately after the disappearance of the cold snap. In the matter of tramway competition, too, which has played such havoc with the Brighton's short distance receipts during the last two years, the Chairman sounded a hopeful note. The electrification of the South London Railway between London Bridge and Victoria is proceeding so satisfactorily as to afford a prospect of the experimental working being commenced early next year, when the Company hopes, not only to arrest the declining tendency in its suburban takings, but to win back some portion, at any rate, of the lost traffic. The Brum dividend caught the market in the wrong mood. Had it been announced immediately after the Midland declaration, when there was talk about the Heavies going in for a dividend equalisation policy, all might have been well. Dealers, however, at the last moment became more optimistic, most of them being sanguine that the North-Western dividend would be at the rate of 7½ per cent. Consequently, the news that the Board had decided to just maintain the 7¼ per cent. rate paid a year ago caused considerable selling on the part of professionals, which temporarily knocked the price down 2½. Yet the dividend in itself was a good one. For the full year the stock receives 6⅜ per cent., and, allowing for accrued dividend, the return at current price is over 4¼ per cent., surely a generous yield to be offered upon the stock of our premier railway. To beat the dividend, it is necessary to go back to 1899, when 7¼ per cent. was paid. Perhaps it was natural that the market should have looked for a bigger distribution, for the Company's gross receipts showed a published gain of £110,000, which was probably much larger, making allowance for under-publication. It is gratifying to observe that £30,000 has been set aside for general reserve (against nothing a year ago), and that the balance carried out is £26,200 more. Still, as the balance brought forward from June last was £21,700 ahead of a year ago, the net improvement in the half-year's results was apparently no more than £34,500. The dividend declared by the Great Western was quite up to expectations. In view of the fact that the Board has during the current year to provide interest on two millions of new Ordinary stock, it was considered unlikely that it would sanction any advance in respect of the half-year just ended, while on the other hand some people even predicted a reduction. The actual result is a repetition of the 7 per cent. paid in the corresponding period of 1906, and an increase of nearly £40,000 in the balance forward, which increase is alone sufficient to pay another ¼ per cent. The dividend for the year works out at 5⅜ per cent., and the yield "clean" is just over 4¼ per cent. Of the results declared by the Metropolitan lines, that of the North London made a good impression. The Company is paying at the rate of 5½ per cent., against 4½ per cent a year ago, which brings the annual dividend up to 5 per cent., as compared with 4¾ per cent. for 1905. Seeing that the published traffics showed a falling off of £6,500, while the increase in the dividend just announced calls for £10,000, the performance seems a very creditable one, even allowing for the increase of nearly £4,000 in the balance brought in. North Londons rose upon the declaration 5 points, to 93-98. From the report subsequently issued I find that the total decrease in gross earnings was only £1,000. Passenger receipts actually showed a small increase, and the fact that the Company carried nearly half a million more passengers is significant that the line is at last making some resistance to the onslaught of tube, tram, and motor 'bus competition. That £9,400 should have been saved in operating costs seems almost too good to be true, especially as nearly £6,000 of the savings occurred under the headings of rates and taxes. The District's announcement of 1½ per cent. per annum on the Four per Cent. Guaranteed stock, as against 1⅛ per cent. a year ago, must not be taken as affording an index to the general results achieved by that Company. The Guaranteed stock is specially secured upon the District's share of the City Lines and Extensions, and the payment of a dividend on it is not inconsistent with a shortage in the fixed charges of the railway, as was the case six months ago, when the deficit was nearly £50,000.

The Grand Trunk Dividend—Market Confidence Justified—An Unusually Promising Outlook—Relative Attractions of "Thirds" and Ordinary Considered—Mexican Rails Booming—A Discussion of Dividend Prospects—A Mexican Central Anomaly.

After weeks of stagnation Grand Trunks have returned with a bound to public favour, and the professional buying that went on in the middle of last week was fully explained when the dividend was made known on Friday. The Board has recommended the payment of 3 per cent. for the year upon the Third Preference Stock, with a carry-forward of £13,200, which compares against 2 per cent. and £4,200 forward a year ago. This result was highly gratifying, the more so as many authorities did not anticipate more than 2½ per cent. upon Thirds. As a matter of fact, estimates based upon the revenue statements for the five months to the end of November (with an allowance for working expenses during December at the rate incurred in the corresponding period) revealed a surplus only sufficient to pay on a 2½ per cent. basis. The Trunk, however, has once again shown how absolutely calculations based on the earnings for five months may be upset by adjustments made during the final month of the half-year (a separate statement in respect of which is never published). On this occasion the end of the year adjustments have been in the direction of substantial savings, hence the payment of 3 instead of 2½ per cent. Analysing the half-yearly figures, there is much that increases one's sense of satisfaction over the addition to the dividend. While gross receipts on the main line rose nearly £300,000, working expenses advanced by nearly £215,000, which hardly suggests a policy of starving the road. The advance in net revenue was £80,500, to which has to be added £32,500, representing a saving in net revenue charges (after allowing for the usual credits). This latter item is very welcome, seeing that it probably is due to improved credits from subsidiaries, including the Grand Trunk Western, and it helps to tone down the effect of the deficiency upon the Canada Atlantic system, which amounts to £34,200, or £16,200 more than in the corresponding half-year. The Canada Atlantic so far has acted as a rather serious drag upon the Grand Trunk, but the deficits shown have no doubt been largely due to more generous outlays upon the road made with a view to bringing it up to the Trunk's standard of efficiency, and so the matter may be construed as a "Bull" rather than a "Bear" point. Allowing for the Canada Atlantic's bigger shortage and a decline of £1,700 in the surplus derived from the Detroit section, the available surplus is £95,000 greater than a year ago. Of this the extra 1 per cent. upon the Third Preference absorbs close on £72,000, and the balance is absorbed by heavier charges (on account of new Guaranteed stock) and the expansion in the carry forward. As to the current half-year, the Grand Trunk has begun it under unusually bright auspices. Startling results may not be achieved in view of the high cost of labour and materials, which no doubt prompted the prophecy of Mr. Hays (the general manager) a few days ago respecting big increases in gross revenue and small gains in net revenue. However, if the Trunk can maintain anything like the record for January, which was an increase in gross receipts of £70,000, it can afford to incur a substantial rise in the expense ratio, and still come out with a net increase larger than the £72,000 wanted to make up the dividend on Thirds to the full 4 per cent. rate. Now that the middle of February has been reached, the market may reasonably hope that the danger of serious damage from snowstorms has passed, while another point that may add to the gaiety of the "Bulls" is that already £56,000 net has been saved on account of the non-repetition this half-year of the item Michigan taxation arrears. As to which stock is best to buy at present price, the Third Preference or the Ordinary, there can be no question about the superior attractions of the former. At current quotation Thirds yield a little under 4½ per cent. If, as there is good reason to hope, the full 4 per cent. be forthcoming in respect of 1907, the return to the investor who buys now will be 5⅞ per cent. Now as to the Ordinary. There is £22,000,000 of this stock, and therefore to pay 1 per cent. upon it requires an addition to net revenue of £220,000 over and above the £72,000 extra required to satisfy the claims of the Third Preference. What addition to gross income will be necessary in order to yield this £292,000 of net revenue I will not venture to estimate, but the most ardent "Bull" of things Canadian must admit that it will be sufficient to call for a fair amount of patience. Assuming, however, that this task be accomplished, Little Trunks would still return a yield of no more than £3 6s. 8d. to a purchaser who bought at the present price of around 30, and consequently the stock would hardly be worth then a higher price than it stands at now, even with "prospects" thrown in. On the other hand, the Third Preference, paying 4 per cent., with a net revenue margin behind it of over £200,000, ought to be standing at par, and thus the man who got in at 70 should be able to ultimately sell at a profit of 30 points, while having in the interim between purchase and sale enjoyed a yield of nearly 6 per cent. Sentiment, I am well aware, plays a big part in the Stock Exchange, and it will probably take up Trunk Ordinary along with the Preference stocks, but the man who wants to lock up his money should consider intrinsic merits before sentiment, remembering that while speculative fervour sometimes produces strange anomalies, such anomalies cannot remain indefinitely; the only standard of valuation that can last is actual earning power. In the Foreign Railway section remarkable strength has been shown by the stocks of the old Mexican Railway, which for some reason not altogether easy to see, often burst into prominence along with Grand Trunks. The First Preference, Second Preference, and the Ordinary have each scored a decided advance. It dos not require much argument to demonstrate the attractions of the First Preference, seeing that the stock is now earning the full 8 per cent. to which it is entitled, that it gives the buyer a return of 5⅝ per cent. upon his outlay, and that the margin of security behind the stock is steadily growing. The advance in the Second Preference, too, although rather rapid of late, does not seem unreasonable, if one analyses the position. To take first the dividend prospects in respect of the half-year to December 31 last, it would be as well not to expect great things. The published traffics amount in round figures to $3,600,000, an increase of $430,000 upon those for the corresponding six months of 1905. Putting the ratio of working expenses at 61 per cent., which was the figure shown a year ago, net receipts would work out at $1,400,000, which, converted into sterling, would represent a gain of, say, £20,000, or just about enough to raise the dividend on the First Preference from the 6⅛ per cent. declared a twelvemonth ago to the full 8 per cent. to which the stock is entitled. It is probable, however, that some reduction will be effected in the ratio of working costs. For the first half of 1906 the proportion was 53½ per cent. This was very low, but if we assume a ratio of 55 per cent. for the past half-year, there would be a net increase of just over £40,000, sufficient to pay the full 8 per cent. on the First Preference and 4 per cent. per annum for the half-year on the Second Preference. A higher rate it would be unwise to count upon; indeed, if this estimate be borne out, the Company will have done very well. On such a basis the dividend upon Seconds for the whole of 1906 would be 3⅞ per cent. Now turning to prospects for the current half-year, there is every reason to take a cheerful view. In respect of the first six months of 1906, the Company paid at the rate of 3¾ per cent. per annum on the Second Preference. To give the stock its full 6 per cent., a net addition of £11,000 is required, and as the line has for the first month of the six published a gain in gross earnings of, roughly, £10,000, the task may quite conceivably be accomplished, with a fair margin to spare. As far as the Ordinary stock is concerned, the current price of a round 50 suggests rather a generous discounting of the future, seeing that after the Second Preference interest is satisfied it will require another £11,000 net to give the Ordinary a dividend of only 1 per cent. I am aware, of course, that the recent rise in Mexican Rails has been accompanied by a revival of rumours as to a capital rearrangement scheme whereby the interest on the First Preference is to be scaled down, and holders offered compensation in the shape of Ordinary stock. No confirmation of such a proposal can be obtained, and all that can be said for the present is that there is nothing inherently improbable about an arrangement of the kind, for 8 per cent. seems a steep rate to maintain on a Preference issue, and if the rumour turns out to be well founded, it must very greatly strengthen the attractions already possessed by the Second Preference. The stocks of the Mexican Central and Mexican National have been very quiet lately, the vagaries of the American Market being a curbing influence, but a fillip should be given before long, when the amalgamation proposed to be effected under the supervision of the Government comes to be practically considered by the shareholders of the respective Companies. Investors who buy National of Mexico First and Second Preferences ought to see a substantial addition to their capital in the course of the next few years, judging by the rapid strides which that country is making. So far as the Mexican Central is concerned, an anomaly that might be studied with profit is the wide discrepancy which exists between the prices of the "A" and "B" classes of certificates issued by the Securities Company. At present, while the interest on the 4 per cent. bonds held as collateral against these certificates depends upon the earnings of the railway, it is not unreasonable that the "B" series should stand rather more than 10 points below the "A" series. In view, however, of the Mexican Government's offer to Guarantee 4 per cent. on the bonds, such a difference cannot last. Of course, the Government's proposals have yet to be considered by the bondholders, but, as the market opinion seems all in favour of the scheme, it is surprising that steps have not been taken before this to bring the quotations for the "A" and "B" certificates closer together. At the time of writing the "A" stand at 92 and the "B" at 81½. As to whether it should be a case of the former being levelled down or the latter being levelled up, I would simply mention that Mexican Government 4 per cent. gold bonds (with which the Railway issues in their converted form would rank) stand at about 95. Turning to Argentine Rails, the record of movements has not been altogether satisfactory lately, what with the revolutionary outbreak (since understood to have been quelled) in the province of San Juan and the new capital requirements. Following the invitation of the Rosario to which allusion was made last week, the Argentine Great Western has made an issue of £600,000 in 5 per cent. Debentures at 102. For so strong a Company to have to give nearly 5 per cent. upon a Debenture stock is significant of the present stringency prevailing in the Money Market. Truly these are times when the capitalist can afford to practically dictate his own terms. The Company, I observe, reserved £300,000 for its own stockholders. It would be strange if the latter allowed such an opportunity to go a begging. The market, I observe, promptly clapped a premium of 2 per cent. upon the issue price of 102.

"FINANCE."—A concise weekly record of markets and prices, published by the CENTRAL STOCK EXCHANGE, LTD. (Established 1893), 66, Cannon-street, London, E.C. Post free for six months to applicants mentioning this paper.

Kaffirs Sag in the Continued Absence of Support—Awaiting the Result of the Transvaal Elections—Jupiter and Simmer West Amalgamation Scheme—Transvaal Gold and Labour Returns for January—Rhodesians Droop.

In Kaffirs business during the past week has been on a small scale. Dealings have been practically limited to local professionals, who have themselves appeared disinclined to increase their commitments to any extent. Anything like a fair display of interest has been confined to a few specialities in which interest has been stimulated by cabled news from the Rand. Seeing that when Yankees were weak the fact exercised a depressing influence throughout the House, it might have been expected that the recovery in those securities would have helped the Kaffir market to some extent, but as a matter of fact it has been of little, if any, assistance, and the general trend has been against holders. It is thought that the imminence of the elections in the Transvaal is tending to restrict speculation in Kaffirs. No doubt there is a disposition on the part of the investing public to await the result of the polls, seeing that the prospects of the Rand gold mining industry are largely dependent upon the manner in which the new legislature deals with the labour question. And, very possibly for the same reason, the "shops" are holding their hands, so that House speculators are without a lead for the time being. The opening of the new Account on Monday was signalised by a sharp drop in the leading counters. The weakness was apparently due to a determined "Bear" raid on the market, which was all the more effective in view of the general disinclination to give fresh support. Below is given a comprehensive list of Kaffir quotations, which shows the change that has taken place during the past month:—

While the general list has been inactive during the past week, a few specialties have come in for a fair amount of attention in consequence of the receipt of news as to developments. Knight Centrals have been bought on the improved developments to which reference was made in last week's notes, and Van Dyks have been a fairly active counter on the strength of a favourable cable, which shows that the result of actual development fully confirms the satisfactory borehole figures. The news from the latter has also served to revive interest in the shares of one or two other Companies whose properties are also situated on the far eastern section of the Rand. Among Deep Level descriptions Jupiter and Simmer and Jack West have come in for some attention in view of the fact that the suggestion to which reference was made in these notes a fortnight ago that these two Companies should be amalgamated has now assumed a more definite shape. Official circulars have been issued to shareholders in the two Companies, giving details of a scheme for their consideration. The proposals involve an increase of the Jupiter's capital from £600,000 to £1,032,000. The idea is that Jupiter shareholders should retain their present holding, while those interested in the Simmer West should receive six shares in the amalgamated undertaking for every five shares now held. This would account for 1,007,000 shares in all, leaving 25,000 in reserve. From the standpoint of economy and favourable working conditions, the amalgamation has advantages, and a point worthy of note is that to which the consulting engineer draws attention in his report—namely, that if the amalgamation is not carried through the probability is that before any reduction plant would be warranted large amounts of the cash at present available would have been spent in advancing the mines towards that stage. As at present situated, the Jupiter is much the better off of the two Companies as regards cash resources and the quantity of ore developed, but the grade of the Simmer West's ore is higher than that of the Jupiter. Turning to the Transvaal gold output statistics for the past month, it will be noted that, contrary to general anticipations, the return does not constitute a fresh record. The January production was 12,529 oz. in weight and £53,220 in value lower than that for December. The following table gives the returns in fine ounces:—

At first sight the latest figures appear disappointing, but it is to be noted that they do no include any gold reserves, whereas the December total included 19,115 oz. under that heading. Allowing for this, the January figures are 6,586 oz. better than those of the previous month.

The gold produced and profits earned by individual Companies are set out in the table below, and it will be observed that in several cases the January earnings were better than those for December, Crown Deep and Robinson both showing increases of over £2,500. On the other hand, the New Heriot's profit dropped by no less than £5,720, the Robinson Deep's by £4,374, while all the East Rand and Randfontein subsidiaries did not do so well last month as in December:

The native labour returns for January are satisfactory as showing a further net increase of 2,336 in the supply. A fair amount of business has been transacted in the well-known Diamond shares during the past week, but no special feature has been presented. In the Colony, it appears, speculative activity is mainly confined to Diamond shares, and cables tell of sensational movements in the shares of new ventures. In the Rhodesian section, business has remained on a limited scale. The prices of the leading descriptions, after fluctuating within narrow limits, developed weakness on Monday in sympathy with Kaffirs, Bankets being one of the weakest spots. Nothing has transpired in connection with the Company's affairs to explain the relapse, however, and the shares, with Chartered, would seem worth picking up on the fall by those prepared to await better general market conditions.

Rally in Americans—"Bear" Covering the Principal Support—President Roosevelt and the Trusts—The Government's Attitude Said to be Less Antagonistic—The Monetary Question.

Writing a few weeks ago upon the outlook for Americans, I ventured to predict that the market was in for a long spell of liquidation, which, however, would be broken by frequent rallies. Shorter's Court has had to wait rather an unexpectedly long time for a rally, but one duly came along last week, as the table given below shows:—

The very unanimity with which the market has lately acted on the "Bear" tack constituted the principal lever by which the big holders of stocks were able to raise values. It requires very little favourable news to startle the "Bears," once the account given for the fall is really big, and, moreover, the ursine brigade have lately had some big profits awaiting to be taken. Perhaps the two items that had most weight in tempting covering orders were the understanding that two big accounts which threatened trouble had been "taken over" by strong people, and rumours that the Trust leaders had made their peace with President Roosevelt. It was said that the Government had modified its plan of action against the Standard Oil Company, and that the Inter-State Commerce Commission would withdraw its opposition to an advance in freight rates providing railroads did not persist in their policy of favouring certain big Corporations by the granting of secret rebates. This news the market made the most of, as it needs to do if it is to soften the effect produced upon the investing public by the recent serious increase in railroad expenses through advances in wages and materials. Those who are looking for increased dividends have not been cheered by the railroad statements for December. Taking fifty of the leading railroads, an analysis for that month shows that thirty have experienced decreases in net receipts, in spite of the fact that forty made increases in gross earnings. Bad weather no doubt is a partial explanation, but higher wages are believed to be principally responsible, and in this connection it has to be borne in mind that the pay roll of many Companies has been further increased since December. As for the monetary question, which, after all, is likely to remain the chief governing factor during the present year, there is still strong evidence pointing to a further shrinkage in values of existing stocks. One of the latest railroad borrowers has been the Delaware and Hudson, and this Company was forced to pay 6 per cent. for the loan of $6,000,000 for a year. The Missouri Pacific is also credited with being in the market for an advance of $50,000,000 upon short term notes, and with having to give 6 per cent. to the buyers. Under such circumstances, it is no wonder that the issue by the American Telephone Company of 4 per cent. bonds at 95½ met with so poor a response. The financial requirements of the railroads are pressing, and in the present state of the New York market, new issues can only be made upon terms that make old securities look unattractive. Europe has lately been a buyer of these short-dated notes, and probably will take more. Some relief may thereby be brought to Wall Street through gold imports, but not to an extent that is likely to finally arrest the downward movement in stocks. If it is good business for London to buy safe bonds that will give 5 to 6 per cent., it is also good for New York, and there will not be wanting financiers who will buy bonds at the expense of parting with junior securities returning lower rates of interest. The United States seems to be in for a year of tight money, and eventually the course of stock values will be determined by the disparity between interest rates and the returns upon fixed investments; consequently, as Mr. Henry Clews puts it, "until interest rates reach a permanently lower level security values must fall at irregular intervals."

Broken Hills Droop—Leading Copper Favourites Active—Important Tinto Rumour—Mount Lyells Relapse—Indian Gold Output—American Gold Shares—Ashanti Goldfields.

Broken Hill descriptions have been affected by selling on the part of local speculators, who apparently became tired of waiting for a fresh upward movement. Colonial support has not been lacking, but it has been insufficient to counterbalance the realisations on this side, so that prices have given way. So far as the mines themselves are concerned, speaking generally, there appears no cause for uneasiness, and the metal prices are satisfactory enough, so that the set-back in share quotations that has occurred seems to afford a favourable opportunity for those who are prepared to pay for their purchases to jump in. Now that the South Blocks' plant has been brought into operation, the shares of this Company will doubtless receive more attention, and it may be added that they appear one of the cheapest selections in the Broken Hill group at present. Zinc Corporations have been quieter, and the quotation has dwindled a little in the absence of further official news, but according to the manager's cable of a week or so ago it should only be a short time now before news comes to hand that the new plant is working properly, and it is confidently anticipated that there will then be a fresh upward movement in the quotation. The carry over on Monday is stated to have disclosed a large "Bear" position in the Zincs. This should prove a source of strength in the future. The leading Copper shares have been active, and the general tendency has been in favour of operators for the rise. Anacondas have reflected the improved tendency displayed by the market in American Rails, while Rio Tintos have sharply advanced on a statement that the Company is on the point of making a material increase in its output. The information is given by the Financial Times as "from a quarter usually well informed," that additional smelters are being established, which, it is said, will be capable of treating another 15,000 tons of ore per day. On the basis of an extraction of 2½ per cent. this would represent an output of 12,000 to 15,000 tons of copper per annum. As the mine is understood to have produced 36,000 tons of copper last year, expansion to the extent suggested would mean that its output would be increased by quite one-third, and, with copper at its present price, this would represent an addition to gross revenue of well over a million sterling per annum. No official statement on the subject is forthcoming so far, and possibly shareholders will have to wait until the meeting in April before they learn whether the above information is well-founded or otherwise, but already some market men are calculating what effect the predicted increase in production is likely to have upon the rate of dividend. As regards the Australian Copper descriptions, active dealings have been confined to a few specialities, and the general tendency has been dull. Mount Lyells have failed to maintain their recent recovery owing to realisations by speculators on this side who considered the latest cablegram as to developments at depth less satisfactory than the earlier messages. The values reported were certainly lower than those given in former cables, but the main point is that ore of payable grade is still being developed as the work proceeds, and those who hold the shares need be in no hurry to sell. Among the smaller-priced Australian shares Chillagoes are inclined to recover now that the time for applying for the new shares has expired. The new issue is understood to have been fully subscribed by shareholders, and it is not improbable that some of the underwriters have been left in the position of "Bears," by having sold old shares against the new which they expected to get allotted in view of the price which ruled in the market for the former. The Company appears to be making good progress. It announces that it expects to bring a third smelter into operation shortly, and that its new lead plant will be ready in May. Besides making profits on the treatment of ore from outside properties, the Company derives revenue from the carriage, on its own railway, of such ore. It has just been announced that the Chillagoe Company has disposed of its holding of shares of the nominal value of £25,000 in its subsidiary, the Mungana, at a price which represents a total sum of nearly £60,000. Wide fluctuations have continued to characterise the Siberian shares which have lately been attracting so much attention, and the weakness of which has exercised a depressing influence on mining descriptions generally. During the past week there has been extensive liquidation in this section, but support has been forthcoming, and prices have rallied from the lowest level reached. Siberian Props. have been down below 6, but it will be seen from the following table that they show no alteration on the week:—

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd, Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

Turning to Indian gold shares, a little more business has latterly been transacted in these descriptions, but, with the exception of Balaghats, which have shown weakness, prices have not materially changed. The steady decline in the price of Balaghats would appear to be due to the disappointing return for January and to the fact that for some months past the mine has not been looking very well. Other Indian mines also report reduced outputs for January, but where the falling off is large it is almost entirely accounted for by the fact that the December figures included the usual end of the year scrapings from the plates. Below is a table showing the gold production of the Indian gold mines for January and for the last four years:—

It will be observed that last month's return is the lowest since June, 1903. Some of the American gold shares have been in better demand than for some weeks past, Esperanzas and Mexico El Oros being rather favoured, the latter in view of the commencement of shipments of high grade ore to the smelters. This is being done in order to provide additional funds for the erection of the mill now in course of erection, and it should not be long before the Company commences to treat ore with its own plant. The El Oro Mining and Railway Company is reported to be doing well, but the heavy capitalisation—£1,080,000 issued out of £1,150,000 authorised—seems to be a drag upon the market and to prevent the price of the shares making much progress. Tomboys have recently come in for a fair amount of attention, and if the results being achieved can be maintained for any length of time, the shares would still seem a promising purchase, as the Company is earning at the rate of 80 per cent. per annum. When, however, the shares had a sharp rise some weeks back heavy American selling promptly follow d. This rather suggests that something is known on the other side which would explain the apparent cheapness of the shares. Camp Bird is another share which appears undervalued, judging from the excellent results obtained since the resumption of milling in November last. But there is evidently "a tap on" here, as selling follows any improvement in the shares, so that the price is kept below 30s. Dealings in the West African market have been on a small scale, the only shares to receive much attention being Ashanti Goldfields, which have been bought in view of the reported success of the roasting plant. Hitherto the Company has only been able to extract from the ore about 65 per cent. of its gold contents, but with the use of the roasting plant it is stated it will be possible to extract quite 90 per cent. This obviously improves the Company's prospects to by no means a trifling extent; it means on future returns a larger revenue per ton, and thus tends to bring nearer the time when it will be possible to resume the payment of dividends.

WESTRALIANS QUIET—HORSESHOE ORE RESERVES STATEMENT—REVIVAL OF INTEREST IN DEEP LEADS ON NEWS FROM LODDON VALLEY—"HIGHLY PAYABLE" RESULTS FROM THE EDGE OF THE DEEP GROUND.

Last week I had to report that rather more business had been transacted in the Westralian Market than for some weeks past, but the slight expansion of interest in this department has not been maintained, and little change in prices has occurred. Golden Horseshoes have continued to attract some attention in view of the favourable rumours recently in circulation as to the Company's position and prospects. None of these rumours, however, has been confirmed. On the contrary, the ore reserves estimate issued with the latest monthly circular, while showing a larger quantity of ore actually "in sight," exhibits a falling off in the total gold contents compared with the previous statement. The mine's reserves as at the end of 1906 are estimated at 992,867 tons, containing 680,355 fine ozs., whereas at the end of 1905 they were estimated to amount to 931,307 tons, containing 700,352 ozs. However, the latest figures represent about four years' supply for the treatment plant, a position which is quite satisfactory as such mines go, though not nearly so "excellent" as rumour made out. As regards the other leading Westralians the dulness of Great Fingalls has been a feature. Apparently this is solely due to realisations induced by the poor results which continue to attend development at depth, but holders need not give up all hope of a fresh run of payable ground being opened up, and it would seem that the current price of the shares allows very little for such a possibility. Among the smaller priced Westralians Chaffers and Cosmopolitans have been receiving some attention, the former on the prospect of the receipt of early news as to the proving of the lode which was located by diamond drill at 1,700 ft. some time ago. The further cable to hand with regard to development at the No. 11 level of the Cosmopolitan Mine is satisfactory as showing a continuance of the payable ore, while the nature of the reference in the message to the No. 12 level is considered to encourage the hope of ore of payable grade being met with sooner or later at the bottom of the mine. Turning to Deep Leads group, a revival of speculative interest in these descriptions has been one of the features of the week in the Mining Markets. Business here has improved, as, earlier than anticipated, further news has come to hand from the Loddon Valley, and it will be seen that it has had a favourable influence upon the prices of the shares:—

The deepest part of the ancient river bed has not yet been entered at the Loddon Valley, but the cable to hand reports that from the edge of the deep ground a section of the "wash" has been sampled. Sufficient data is not available to enable one to arrive at a definite conclusion as to the actual value on a working basis, but the managers in their cable state that the result is "highly payable." As the deepest part of the lead is expected to give the most satisfactory results the news now to hand must be regarded as very encouraging. It is expected that the "wash" at the bottom of the river will be entered about the end of the current month, and in the event of the results obtained proving to be still more satisfactory than those reported in the latest cable, it would not be surprising if a Deep Leads boomlet ensued.

The Bishop Creek Wild Cat.

Apropos of my remarks last week on the Bishop Creek Gold Mine Co., a correspondent writes:—

> You did not mention the interesting fact that the "precious privilege" of buying shares at half price in the Bishop Creek Gold Company is being offered to the readers of the Economist and the Statist. Both these journals have published the Lombard Association's advertisement, describing the company's mine as "the world's greatest gold mine," and quoting the treasurer's statement that "dividends will be over £4,000,000 a year," and the shares now offered at 10s. 5d. "should sell for £60 each, and they will." The Statist, while inserting the advertisement, ridiculed it in an editorial note; the Economist left it to speak for itself.

No doubt it may be said that the readers of my eminent contemporaries are not exactly the sort of people who are likely to be gammoned by such a share-pushing concern as the Lombard Association. Still, one naturally looks to the leading financial journals to set a good example to the rest of the press, and their example certainly is not good when they give the countenance of their columns to what is manifestly an attempt to impose upon the credulity of innocent investors. Lest it should be supposed that this is a case of "sour grapes," I may add that the advertisement in question was refused insertion in Truth.

An Opportunity for the Masses.

In a publication prematurely dated February 15, Martin and Church, Craven House, Kingsway, W.C., observe:—

> Opportunities for the masses to share in the profits of commercial and industrial enterprises have been comparatively rare.

Being evidently a "House"—they call themselves a "House"—with democratic and benevolent sympathies, Martin and Church have determined to remedy this injustice. The aforesaid publication, a four-page sheet the size of a halfpenny evening paper, is filled with flapdoodle designed to convince the masses that they can become rich by taking shares in "The British Exploration and Development Company," which is "now being incorporated under the Laws of the State of Arizona, U.S.A." The shares are sixpence each, payable in three instalments! . . . . . On reflection I think I should have headed this note "An Opportunity for the Police." The whole thing is a transparent, unmistakable ramp.

The Prescience of Wm. Tyler and Co.

That sudden drop in Brighton "A's" must have given a peculiarly sharp, short shock to the patrons of Wm. Tyler and Co., Pinner's Hall, Old Broad-street. On Saturday week this philanthropic firm, whose name is well-known to my readers, sent out a circular exhorting all and sundry to seize "practically an absolutely secured and certain profit by buying at once, without delay, Brighton Railway 'A' stock" on a 2 per cent. cover. It was a secured and certain profit, because each £100 stock would carry the dividend of £5, or two and a half times as much as the deposit, and there was besides the "enormous possibility" of a rise in the price of the stock, which would yield "a still much larger profit." A little rise of ten points was, in fact, suggested as quite likely, and with the profit on this added to the dividend, each £10 deposit, controlling £500 stock, would earn £75. Imagine guileless recipients of this valuable tip hurrying on Sunday to remit their money "at once, without delay," to Wm. Tyler and Co. And then imagine their feelings when on Monday afternoon or Tuesday morning they learnt that, instead of making the certain profit, they had incurred a dead loss through the stock dropping three points, and the cover running off! Really, it was a very smart operation for the cover-snatchers, whose prescience is shown in predicting an advance in stocks which are about to fall.

Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. Again.

"An Easy Way to Fortune" is the alluring title of one of the pamphlets issued by Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., of Paris. The way is doubtless easy for that notorious firm, but how tedious and dismal and delusive it is for their victims is shown once more by a case which has been brought under my notice. By means of gross misrepresentations on the part of an agent of Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., the victim in this case was hoodwinked into paying them £260 for a "combination" of foreign government and municipal premium bonds. This was in 1900. He soon found out that a number of the bonds were of very small value, and that he had been charged exorbitantly for the whole lot. Believing that his only course was to make the best of a bad bargain, he did not attempt to recover his money, but in 1902 he got Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. to exchange some of the bonds for others which he thought more attractive. This exchange involved a further loss; and down to the present date the owner of the bonds has never had the luck to draw one of those prizes which figure so conspicuously in the literature issued by Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. and other touting firms. There are premium bonds which are not without some attractions for people who want a gamble. But the objection to Cunliffe, Russell, and Co.'s business is that they not only charge outrageously excessive prices even for the better bonds, but deliberately palm off trashy ones on unwary purchasers, and, in fact, make the whole business a delusion and a snare to the innocents on whom they prey. In another case of which I have heard in the last few days Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. sold a "combination" of nine foreign bonds for £51. The purchaser found that he had been imposed upon, and after three or four months the firm bought back the bonds for £41 10s. This had really been their market value at the time Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. charged £51 for them, no material reduction in price having occurred in the interval.

As I have previously stated, a number of people have secured verdicts against Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. in the Paris Courts, and any victim who is disposed to take legal proceedings there for the recovery of his money can obtain from the Editor of TRUTH the name of the French advocate—the agent in Paris of a well-known firm of London solicitors—who conducted these cases. This gentleman has, by the way, just informed me of his latest success against these extortioners. He sued them on behalf of a lady who had been gulled into paying £115 by monthly instalments for some bonds really worth about £58 or £60. Judgment was given against Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. for the return of the £115 with interest from the date of each monthly instalment, and they were, of course, also condemned to pay the costs of the proceedings.

Though the most notorious, Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. are by no means the only firm in the same line of business. Melville, Glyn and Co., who are also located in Paris, and the International Securities Syndicate in London, are both busily engaged in beguiling unwary speculators into the payment of exorbitant prices for premium bonds. Like the rival Paris firm, Melville, Glyn and Co. sometimes send a persuasive-tongued, not too veracious, representative to make a personal call upon any promising dupe; and I have just been furnished with particulars of a case in which this was done, with disastrous results for the dupe, in the North of England.

"TRUTH" LEITER BOX.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" reply by post.

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

M. M., Winchfield.—Neither class of bond can be called safe, although the security behind both has improved considerably during the last few years. In my opinion, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series) would be preferable.

RAILWAYS.

Rio. This is not a security I care for, and I think you might realise. If there were any prospect of redemption at due date, the quotation would not stand at 10 discount. W. H., Leeds.—Your question was anticipated by my remarks in last week's issue, from which you will have already gathered that I advise selling.

Sunny Jim.—The market talks of a favourable report being issued in April, and the shares during the last week or so have shown a tendency to improve. They are, of course, nothing more than a gambling counter at present, but under the circumstances I would not be in too great a hurry to sell. Constant Reader, Southampton.—Better postpone a purchase for the present, as, in the absence of public interest, the stock is not unlikely to go lower. Constant Reader, Saundersfoot.—Cuban Central Debentures are a sound investment. At the present price you ought to hold on to Dominion Atlantic Second Debentures. I am a strong believer in the outlook for the National of Mexico, and think the First Preferred an attractive investment. Nestor.—The new stock under the guarantee is a high-class investment. The guarantee ranks after Great Central Debentures. In regard to your last question, I cannot say off-hand, but the matter is scarcely of great importance, seeing that the lease is for 999 years. Japan.—The Hull dividend was 4½ per cent. for the half year, making 2¼ per cent. for the twelve months. At the time the article you refer to was written the price was 49. Allowing for accrued dividend therefore, the yield was fully 4¾ per cent. I regard the stock as a promising holding. Fritz.—Your obvious course is to allow the option to run. You will not lose anything by the deduction of the dividend, as the amount taken off the quotation will be credited to your account.

MINES.

Soldier.—1 and 2. Taking everything into consideration, Great Boulders, Ivanhoes, and Kalgurlis appear the best holdings, but it is impossible to estimate the lives of such mines. 3. Developments at depth have been disappointing, but a purchaser at the present price would be likely to come out satisfactorily in the long run. Jock.—I cannot recommend you to subscribe more money in respect of this concern. The papers have been returned. Reading.—Do not deal with the firm mentioned. Van.—1. They are a fair speculative holding for a moderate profit. 2. The old company paid a dividend of 6d. in 1899, but the present concern has not made a distribution. 3. £225,000 in 10s. shares. Hake, Burton Agnes.—You might hold in hope of some recovery eventually, and then cut your loss. Captain X.—I see no reason to advise an immediate sale. It is impossible to estimate the lives of such mines as these. Medicus.—You may as well hold 3 and 4, but realise the others on any recovery, and put the proceeds into the suggested purchase. Sphinxalex.—Hold for a recovery. Spes.—A promising holding, but you should be content with a moderate profit. See my notes this week. Borderer.—1. See answer to "Jock." 2. A bucket-shop. Thyra.—You had much better keep your money than put it in this concern.

MIXED SECURITIES.

R. B., Wiesbaden.—You could obtain 4 to 5 per cent. with excellent security by spreading the money over United States Steel Second Mortgage bonds, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, Buenos Ayres Western Railway New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, Chinese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds of 1898, Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, and Imperial Tobacco Preference. The following would give from 5 to 6 per cent.:—Mexican Railway First Preference, San Paulo Railway Ordinary, Buenos Ayres and Rosario Ordinary, Natal Bank "B" shares (2½ paid), Bryant and May, and London United Trams Preference. The reference work for your purpose is "The Stock Exchange Year Book," published at 28s., by Thomas Skinner, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, London, E.C. Canada.—1. Carrying Irish Land stock on margin strikes me as an excellent method of losing money with the Bank Rate at 5 per cent. You were not entitled to the dividend, as dividends on British Government stocks are deducted a month before they become due. 2. I should not be surprised to see a further decline. N. H.—Your investments have been well chosen, and I think you might safely leave the money where it is. As regards the Mexican Central certificates, I would refer you to my remarks in another column. You might, after reading them, think it worth while to exchange from the A. to the B. series. X.—1. Very little information is available as to this concern, and I have not heard a price for the shares. 2. Very speculative, but may have some recovery later on. 3. A fair holding for dividends. 4. I do not know. 5. The stock is worth keeping as an investment, but if you bought for an early profit you might as well take the present opportunity of realising. 6. Hold for a moderate profit. South Devon.—1, 2, and 3. Hold these. 4. The Company is at present paying 6 per cent., and the maintenance of this rate has not, in my opinion, been jeopardised by the new capital issue; indeed, without allowing for the benefits that will accrue from the proposed outlay, the current profits are sufficient to pay another 1 per cent. Edie.—1. Deal with a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. I cannot say what the custom of this firm is, but I presume you have received contract notes to show that you have bought the shares. 3. I have not a high opinion of the mining shares or the others. I do not recommend brokers. Investor, Oxford.—Yes. The mining shares are very speculative, but there seems a fair chance of their having some recovery eventually. Bingo.—I am sorry, but I cannot undertake to give advice on a list of eighteen different securities. Fewer questions at a time, please. Scrutator.—1. I see no reason to look for much advance with these in the near future. 2. The prospects of the company are good. 3. See my article this week. Marie.—1. Johannesburg Consolidated Investment. 2. Have good prospects, subject to the labour question being satisfactorily settled. 3. Very speculative. 4. No. 5. Only from a broker. F. E. A.—It will require consideration, but I will endeavour to give you such a list next week.

"TRUTH" will be sent weekly to any address in the United Kingdom for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or 28s. for 12 months. The subscription for all Countries included in the Postal Union is, 3 months, 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; 12 months £1 10s. 8d. All subscriptions are payable in advance, and cheques and P.O.O.'s should be made payable to the MANAGER, "Truth" Buildings, Carteret-street, S.W.

Miscellaneous.

F. M., Malvern; W. G. L., Bromyard; C. S. J., Oxford; and M. D., Stockport.—Thanks for the circulars. I will deal with the bucket-shops in question in an early issue. Claco.—Certainly not; the so-called Charing Cross Bank is a usury shop run by one Carpenter. Magister.—See preceding answer. I do not know the other concern, but if you have at present a safe 3½ per cent. investment you had better stick to it. L. G., Hathersage. — Do not deal with these or any other German lottery touts. Prudence and Jay Bee. — I cannot give advice as to the relative merits of the Continental Government and Municipal premium bonds in your lists. If you want to make a purchase apply to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. Such touting firms as the International Securities Syndicate, Cunliffe, Russell, and Co., and Melville, Glyn and Co., charge extremely exorbitant prices for the bonds. C. B. P., Bangalore.—They would swindle you. H. A. S.—I have no evidence on the point you raise, but see my answers above. Diogenes, Limerick, St. Leonards, and Lincoln.—You did not send coupons. See rules above. A. A. B.,—Your best plan would be to realise and put the proceeds into something more hopeful. A.M.T., Dorking.—1. They make a fair commercial investment. 2. There is no apparent reason why they should go up. 3. Apollinaris Ordinary yield about 8 per cent., and Darracqs about 8¾ per cent. Doubtful.—Better hold on to the insurance shares for a recovery in the future, which seems not improbable. The effect of the recent catastrophes will pass away in time. Banshee.—They are a fair holding of their type. As to the work of reference, note my answer above to "R. B., Wiesbaden." Mrs. P., Lée.—1 You could do better. 2. A fair holding. 3. I would not advise you to average in view of recent developments. 4. Upon any recovery sell out. Juno.—1. They could be improved upon. 2. You might hold on. Ellichporé.—My opinion of hotel shares as a group, from the purely investment point of view, is a poor one. Bristol, E.—The proposed exchange does not seem a wise one. As the dividend season approaches it is quite possible that Nelsons will touch the figure named. Brash.—I have a very poor opinion of the concern, and if you could sell the bonds you should do so. Motors.—The shares are unattractive, and, rather than improve the position and prospects, the combination is calculated to make them worse. As to the published traffic, it is impossible to form any opinion of the position, because the number of vehicles in employment has increased considerably. Bill.—All three are fairly attractive. They are controlled in Canada. Scat.—1. Daimlers are talked to 10 on the bright possibilities, and Darracqs would be fairly attractive. Both are speculative. 2. Paquins give about 6¾ per cent., Rio Flour Mills about 8¼ per cent., and Carlton Hotel 8¾ per cent. 3. There is no reason why she should not be registered as a shareholder, but it would be much more prudent to keep her little capital in the savings bank. Scarbro'.—Ignore the request and await developments. Edcot.—1. The concern is not one that I would in any circumstances recommend, and I am afraid you would experience some difficulty in selling the bond. 2. A matter for negotiation. 3. No proper balance sheet is ever published. Novo.—You would be well advised not to go to the concern in question. There are many more desirable offices transacting the same business. Pem, Londonderry.—If your first consideration is security and you favour industrials they make a fair selection, Dunlop Debentures, perhaps, excepted. Lincoln.—Purely an American concern, which is not represented on this side. As to reports and balance sheets, they are not available, here, at all events. Clericus.—1. Certainly as great a risk. 2. The first office you mention may be safe, but I should greatly prefer the second, although the terms are not so good. James. — I do not recommend any brokers. It is a method of speculation; some books are published explaining it. A. W. P. A. — I shall be dealing shortly with the firm in question. I do not recommend any lotteries. Castria: — It must be highly speculative. The attractive-looking estimates in the prospectus are not based on actual results. Farway.—As stated elsewhere, I can place you in communication with a solicitor in Paris.

Insurance.

Wellington.—The Ocean and Employers' Liability are both first-class companies. The company in which you hold shares is commencing this business, but I have not yet seen its prospectus. I shall be dealing with the whole subject in an article shortly. G. B. T.—I have no great opinion of the first company you mention. It is of recent origin, and its financial position is scarcely strong enough for the liabilities undertaken. The other company you name found competition of wealthier offices too much for it, and the shareholders gained by the sale. Your policy is, of course, quite safe. San Marco.—The only other company I know of is the Yorkshire Fire and Life, who give more favourable terms occasionally in the event of ill-health, but do not make this a regular feature.

Industrials Generally Flat—Motor and Cycle Shares Brisk—Woolcombers Fall—Beyer-Peacock Report—Anglo "A" Down—London General Omnibus Company.

Though it is evident from the Board of Trade returns for January that the foreign trade of the country still continues to expand, business in the leading Industrial securities remains more or less at a standstill. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the figures issued last week, the outstanding features being the increases in the imports of raw materials and the exports of manufactured goods. The fact that the trade of the country is so flourishing obviously has a specially favourable significance for the Industrial market, and the reasons for the coyness which is nevertheless exhibited both by speculators and investors must, of course, be sought in other directions. During the week the motor and cycle section has been decidedly the most animated and cheerful. The shares of the Eadie Manufacturing Company of Redditch, which stood at 2⅞ at the beginning of January, have been steadily advancing of late, and on the news of a proposed amalgamation of this concern with the Birmingham Small Arms Company, the price rose to 4. Eadies last year paid 25 per cent. and the B.S.A. 15 per cent. Since the B.S.A. took up the manufacture of cycles it has been working several of the Eadie cycle patents, and this is reported to have been an important factor in bringing about the amalgamation. Argyll Motors, Daimlers, and Darracqs have been active, and at the present prices I am inclined to regard all these as hopeful purchases for a speculative investment. The prospects of this industry generally are, indeed, distinctly bright. In Textiles, Calico Printers have been most conspicuously in demand, while a drop in Woolcombers, Limited, occurred on the announcement of a dividend of 5 per cent. on the Ordinary shares, which had stood at 2⅜. I hear from Bradford, however, that the balance-sheet will show that the results of the year's working have really been more satisfactory than was assumed from the amount of the dividend, the Directors having met considerable expenditure for new machinery, etc., out of the year's earnings, and retained a good balance in hand. Trade at Bradford is now more prosperous than for years past, and all the wool-combing firms are very busy. A much-discussed report was that of Beyer, Peacock, and Co., the locomotive engineers, whose Ordinary shareholders now receive a dividend of 10 per cent., after getting nothing in 1905 and 1904. This led to a slight advance in the Ordinary and the Preference issues, but it is considered in many quarters that the position of the Company is still unsatisfactory, the inadequacy of the amount placed to the depreciation account being especially commented upon. In Catering descriptions there have been no notable changes, but Brewery shares as a rule have given way, and in view of the probability of a Licensing Bill—which can hardly fail to have an adverse influence on prices—being introduced by the Government this Session, a further decline may be anticipated. The most important exception to the rule has been presented by Guinness stocks, which benefited from the announcement of an interim dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum on the Ordinary stock, as compared with 16 per cent. a year ago. Anglo-American Telegraph Company Deferred stock, which has been receding as the outcome of profit-taking since the recent announcement of the dividend of 35s. per cent., had quite a sharp break on Friday in consequence of the chairman's statement at the meeting that the increase in the traffic receipts was to a large extent due to the exceptional earnings of their cable-repairing ship, and also to the fact that £20,000 was no longer being taken out of revenue for renewals. However, another spirited gamble in this stock is sure to come in due season. Two years ago the London General Omnibus Company paid 8 per cent. on its Ordinary stock, last year the dividend dropped to 6 per cent., and this year it is only 5 per cent.—and this will involve a withdrawal of £15,000 from the general reserve. The immediate effect of this news has been a tumble of £10 in the price of the stock, which is now 67½. Last year it was never lower than 82, and at one time it was as high as 117.

QUEER STORY.

TRINDER'S KNIGHTHOOD.

THE financial position of the Rottenborough Conservative and Unionist Club (hereinafter, as the lawyers would say, to be known as the R.C. and U.C.) was undeniably parlous. In fact, it was quite evident that, unless substantial aid was promptly forthcoming, the Club must go on the rocks. But the question was, whence was such aid to be procured?

The Hon. Algernon Fitzjawkins, M.P.—the sitting member—had already been bled to his utmost capacity; while other prominent Conservatives in the borough, long tired of putting their hands in their pockets, were not disposed to come forward with anything more solid than good advice—that cheap commodity so frequently offered, so seldom taken, and even when it is taken, still more seldom productive of any benefit to the taker.

Here, at any rate, it was perfectly useless. What's the good of preaching economy to an insolvent threatened with instant bankruptcy? It is like lecturing a patient suffering from acute pneumonia on the imprudence of sitting in wet feet, while not attempting to treat his immediately pressing malady. "Save my life first," he might well say, "and then lecture me, if you like."

So now, the life of the R.C. and U.C. had to be first saved, before good advice as to its future administration could be of any possible service; and a big cheque was the only thing to save it.

But from whom was that big cheque to be obtained?

One thing was quite certain, in the mind of Algernon Fitzjawkins. The club must not be allowed to go broke. In the first place, such a collapse would have a disastrous moral effect on Conservatism in the borough. In the next, the members, deprived of their comfortable institution and the many free shows and amusements connected with it, would be sure to join the Liberal club, and would so contract the deadly taint of radicalism, with the result that he, Algernon Fitzjawkins, would probably lose his seat at the next election. Such a catastrophe must not be permitted to occur. The Club must be saved and put on its legs. The money requisite for that purpose must be found. And Algernon Fitzjawkins set himself to get hold of somebody who might be induced to find it.

After thinking the matter over, he decided that William Trinder was the most likely man. William Trinder was better known to the general public as "Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet." He was rich. His politics were, on the whole, Conservative; although, as a large importer of foreign meat, he viewed with disfavour the wild schemes of tariff reform which had recently become one of the planks in the platform of the Conservative Party. But—and here it was that Fitzjawkins hoped to have him—William Trinder had one really vulnerable spot. He was known to hanker after titular distinction—a knighthood at least, or if possible, a baronetcy. And with such a bait before his eyes, a Conservative Ministry being then in power, he might—despite his views on tariff reform—be easily induced (so Fitzjawkins calculated) to do a signal pecuniary service to the Conservative cause.

The amount actually required to meet the pressing needs of the club was a little short of £3,000. But Fitzjawkins thought that, while he was about it, he might as well go for double that amount. Trinder, as I have said, had heaps of money. He could pay the larger sum with no more inconvenience than he could pay the smaller; and that extra £3,000 would come in uncommonly handy for the next electoral campaign, to enable Algernon Fitzjawkins to do things in style without expense to himself. In short, the seat was to be retained by Fitzjawkins with the cash of Trinder. A very convenient arrangement—for Fitzjawkins; and all the more so, because even as it was, our M.P.'s income was insufficient to meet his ordinary current expenses, and he was rather heavily in debt.

But, of course, the matter wanted delicate handling. Moreover, it was beset with difficulties. In the first place, Fitzjawkins, being only slightly acquainted with Trinder, couldn't go and bluntly offer to procure him a knighthood for £6,000; and, in the second place, he was by no means in the position to be sure of carrying out his promise if he did.

The Fitzjawkins' interest with the party leaders was small. It was true the Member for Rottenborough's father was an Earl and held a subordinate post in the Government; but he had neither the money, the influence, nor the ability to carry much weight in their councils. Indeed, he might have resigned office and withdrawn his support from the party to-morrow without in the least affecting their strength or disturbing their equanimity.

Still, "Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet" would, probably, not altogether realise this. To a plebeian, who had begun life as an errand boy, and who, at fifty, was still outside the social pale, an Earl was an Earl—a personage in politics and society—one who could pull all sorts of useful wires—one with whom it was worth while to stand well. That pious delusion must be carefully sustained and fomented. Trinder must have it delicately, yet emphatically, instilled into him that the Fitzjawkins' interest would easily run to a knighthood—if not to a baronetcy. Everything must be liberally implied, yet nothing must be definitely promised. In fine, all the artifices of diplomacy must be employed to lead Trinder to believe he was putting his money on a dead cert., when, as a fact, he was really backing an outsider at long odds.

You are not to conclude, if you please, that Fitzjawkins was deliberately planning to jockey Trinder out of £6,000. He fully intended to get him quid pro quo, in the shape of a knighthood, if he could. But he also intended to protect himself, in case of failure, by refraining from giving any actual pledge that might afterwards be brought up against him. This, indeed, is the very A B C of diplomacy—to cajole the other man into construing your remarks in a sense in which you mean him to construe them, but which, detached from your tone and manner of uttering them, they will not really bear. And you must not be too hard on Fitzjawkins for practising in a small way that art which, when successfully practised on a large scale by ambassadors, is rewarded with orders, titles, and the highest public honours.

But it is necessary to catch your hare before you can cook him. And the first thing Fitzjawkins had to do was to get hold of "Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet." He began by enlisting the services of Tommy Betts, a bachelor friend of his, who knew Trinder fairly well, in bringing him in touch with the millionaire.

Betts undertook to do what he could in the matter, but hinted pretty intelligibly that he should expect to make a bit out of it; and, upon being asked to name his terms, stipulated for a commission of 5 per cent. on whatever Trinder might be induced to spring. To this Fitzjawkins raised no objection, privately determining to get another thousand out of Trinder, so as to cover Betts's commission, with a handsome margin. Indeed, the difference between £6,000 and £7,000 was nothing to a man of Trinder's means, who would doubtless be willing enough to pay the latter figure for his coveted knighthood.

On this basis, the two friends got to work. Betts opened the campaign by giving a little dinner at the Carlton, to which Trinder, Fitzjawkins, and one other man—an immaterial person, so far as this story is concerned—were invited. The dinner was good, the champagne, if possible, better, and conversation soon became genial and general.

It was now that Fitzjawkins, having turned the talk into channels political, introduced, quite casually and naturally, the subject of the R.C. and U.C.

"I'm afraid there's no doubt," he remarked, "that at the present moment our party's undergoing a general set-back throughout the country. Swing of the pen dulum, I suppose ——"

"Tariff reform, more likely," interposed William Trinder.

"Well, I dare say that has something to do with it," admitted Fitzjawkins, affably. "Anyway, there it is. I notice many signs of it in my own constituency. There's our local Conservative club now—excellent institution, doing capital work, providing working men with all sorts of advantages, and yet, owing to constantly diminishing support, it's in serious danger of going on the rocks. I was talking to A. J. about it only yesterday" (this, of course, was a pure myth), "and telling him that, if things didn't look up, we should soon have to close our doors. He begged me, at any cost, to get our people to hold on until after the next election. But I told him plainly that we couldn't do so without funds. And he said he'd try and get some wealthy member of the party to come to our assistance. I'm sure I hope he'll succeed. It will give the party a nasty knock in Rottenborough if our club goes under, and very likely lose me the seat, into the bargain. However, we must hope for the best."

"But expect the worst," struck in Betts, sententiously.

"Lay you five to one the wealthy philanthropist dcesn't materialise, Algie. Men who plank down thousands in the party interest look for some more likely field than—excuse my saying so—an insignificant concern like your Rottenborough Club. They want to give their oof where it will attract public attention and get them a title or an order. Don't blame 'em, either. Politics is a business, not a charity, when all's said and done."

"Ah! But if the oof's found to oblige A. J., you bet A. J. won't forget the finder," replied Fitzjawkins, with a knowing wink. "Besides, even if he should—well, there always the governor to fall back upon. He's only an under-secretary, it's true but he can still pull a wire or two. But there, don't let us spoil a rippin' dinner with any more of this beastly shop."

"Hang it all, man, you began it," said Betts.

"Peccavi," laughed Fitzjawkins. "And now, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the previous question."

Thus the subject was thrust aside with a careless jest. That was part of the game—not to emphasise it unduly. But enough had been said for the purpose. The ground bait had been artfully laid for the observant fish. It remained to be seen whether or not the fish would take it.

The said fish—Trinder's Peptonised Pig's Feet—made no sign, at the moment, one way or the other. But, after dinner, when they adjourned to the smoking-room, he paired with Fitzjawkins and, over a cigar and coffee, led the conversation round to the Rottenborough Conservative Club.

"Sorry to hear that Club of yours is in such a dicky state," he remarked.

"Yes; beastly nuisance. But it can't be helped," answered Fitzjawkins, elaborately suppressing an imaginary yawn, as though he were sick of the tiresome subject.

"It is certainly a case in which some rich man ought to come forward," said Trinder, not to be put off.

"Oh! I don't know," rejoined the other, carelessly, "rich men have so many claims on them nowadays, that one can't expect too much. However, I know A. J. will work the oracle for me, if he can. And if he can't—why, what will be, will be," added Algie Fitzjawkins, with easy fatalism.

"I don't see why the thing need be left to chance at all," pursued William Trinder, "I suppose the sum required is nothing so very enormous."

"Depends upon what you call enormous," answered Fitzjawkins. "It's not exactly a flea-bite, anyway. To pay off the mortgage on the premises and put the thing on a really sound basis can't be done a penny under seven thousand pounds."

"Is that all?" remarked William Trinder.

"All?" ejaculated Fitzjawkins, sorry now that he hadn't said ten thousand. "You talk of seven thousand as though it were a mere bagatelle."

"Hardly that," rejoined William Trinder, "seven thousand pounds is seven thousand pounds, of course—a considerable sum of money; not so considerable, however, but that there must be plenty of public-spirited men able and willing to provide it, in so good a cause."

"Wish I could find 'em," laughed Fitzjawkins, secretly delighted to see how his fish was rising.

"I can find you one such man, at any rate," answered William Trinder.

"You can?" ejaculated Fitzjawkins, with feigned astonishment. "Who?"

"Me," said William Trinder, whose grammar was not always according to Lindley Murray.

"Oh, come! you're joking," cried Fitzjawkins.

"Devil a bit," said William Trinder.

"But, I say! This is really too good of you," exclaimed Algie.

"Mr. Fitzjawkins," answered Trinder, looking his companion steadily in the eyes, "I'm a plain man, and I won't attempt to beat about the bush with you. You may as well understand at once that I don't make you this offer out of pure philanthropy. If I find seven thousand pounds for the Conservative party, I shall expect due—ahem!—recognition from the party leaders; and I should only give the money on that clear understanding,"

"Now, I call that damned honest of you, to put the case so frankly," replied Fitzjawkins. "I like a man who talks straight and doesn't put on any humbugging pretences. You know where you are then, and can do business properly. There will be no difficulty about this 'recognition'—within reason, of course. Will you tell me, in confidence, what you expect?"

"I would be content with a Knighthood," answered William Trinder, modestly.

"Oh, it will run to that, all right," replied Fitzjawkins, with confidence.

"I will not ask for any guarantee," continued William Trinder. "Your word, as a gentleman, is enough."

"Right O! you needn't be afraid of my letting you down," replied Algie, implying, but not (you will note) actually giving, the required pledge.

Trinder, however, not suspecting any double dealing, was quite satisfied.

"I will send you a cheque to-morrow morning," he said, briskly.

He sent the cheque, and Algie paid it into his bankers. This, in the Scriptural phrase, was "the beginning of sorrows." For just now, as fate would have it, our M.P.'s creditors, who, hitherto, had been commendably patient, began to grow restive; and a considerable part of Trinder's £7,000 had to be spent in satisfying their pressing demands. Consequently only quite a small fraction found its way into the coffers of the R.C. and U.C.—just enough to tide things over and no more.

It was awkward, in more ways than one. There was the matter of the Knighthood, for instance. Even if Fitzjawkins could have brought Trinder's name before the Prime Minister, backed by that gift of £7,000 to the Rottenborough Conservative Club, it is improbable that he could have got the donor his promised titular distinction. But, as it was, he could not venture to bring Trinder's name forward at all; since to do so was simply to call attention to an irregularity which he must, at any cost, conceal.

Consequently, he did nothing, but just let matters slide.

However, "Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet" was not the man to take this sort of thing lying down, as Algie Fitzjawkins soon found. By the end of six weeks, having heard nothing whatever of his expected knighthood, he began to make himself troublesome. It was in vain that Algie tried to put him off with various excuses. Trinder saw that he was merely being played with, and soon let the other see that he didn't mean to stand it. He called upon Fitzjawkins, one afternoon, at the latter's house in Eaton-place, and tackled him in the most determined manner.

"Look here, Mr. Fitzjawkins," he began. "About that knighthood you promised to get me——"

"Yes, yes, my dear Mr. Trinder—that will be all right—perfectly all right," interposed Algie, hastily. "But these things take time, don't you know. Any amount of routine and red-tape and all that sort of thing. Government offices are never in a hurry. It's against their principles."

"That won't do for me, Mr. Fitzjawkins," retorted William Trinder, looking very unpleasant and resolute. "I'm sick of excuses. And I won't listen to any more of them. It's my belief you have never brought my name before the Prime Minister at all."

"Oh! I assure you, Mr. Trinder, you are entirely mistaken. . . . I—I—mentioned the matter to our chief some weeks ago, and he promised to give it his favourable consideration."

"Umph! That can easily be ascertained by inquiry," answered Trinder, rudely.

"Oh! If you mean to say you doubt my word," retorted Algie, making rather a feeble attempt to assume the insulted man of honour. "I decline——"

"Besides," pursued Trinder, ignoring the interruption, "I have reason to believe that only a small fraction of my seven thousand pounds, given expressly for the benefit of the Rottenborough Conservative Club, has ever found its way into the hands of the treasurer of that institution."

"Really, Mr. Trinder, now you are accusing me of cheating. I never heard of anything so——"

"Yes, Mr. Fitzjawkins," interposed the other, bluntly. "I am accusing you of cheating; what then?"

And he looked the unhappy Algie steadily in the face.

"What then?" he repeated.

"It's a—a—damned lie," cried Algie, trying to look righteously indignant, and failing signally.

"If you persist in that statement, I shall insist—as a subscriber—on seeing the club's books," answered William Trinder, with cold determination.

Then Algie saw that the game of bluff was up, and that his only course was to confess, and, as far as possible, to excuse, what could be no longer concealed.

"Well, I did borrow some of the money to tide me over a temporary embarrassment," he admitted.

"The law has an ugly name for this sort of borrowing," said William Trinder, grimly.

"The law?"

Algie Fitzjawkins stood aghast at this thinly veiled threat of criminal proceedings.

"I should be sorry, of course, to have to take so extreme a line," replied William Trinder; "but unless I can get some sort of satisfaction, I shall be compelled to do so."

"You mean, you must have your knighthood?"

"No, Mr. Fitzjawkins, I do not mean that; for I am perfectly well aware that your political influence is so trifling that you could never obtain it for me. But there are other directions in which you can be useful to me—social directions; and it is here that I venture to invite your co-operation," said William Trinder, in a meaning tone.

"W-what the deuce do you mean?" stammered Algie.

"I mean," answered Trinder, coolly, "that if you will get your wife, Lady Mary, and your mother, the Countess, to call upon Mrs. Trinder, to invite us to their houses, and to introduce us to the right sort of people, I will neither press the matter of my knighthood nor ask inconvenient questions about my seven thousand pounds."

Algie Fitzjawkins, seeing that he was fairly cornered, had no option but to submit to these terms.

"Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet" went home and told his wife the result of his interview.

"But, William, suppose he plays us false over this, as he did over the knighthood," remarked the lady, dubiously.

Trinder smiled:

"My dear Harriet, I have the whip hand of him now. He will not dare to play us false again," he said. "And, as for that knighthood—you don't imagine I ever expected to get it, do you?"

"Didn't expect to get it, William? Then why on earth did you part with seven thousand pounds?"

"For a very good reason, Harriet. I knew that the Fitzjawkins' interest was politically nil, though socially of considerable value. I therefore pretended to fall into the fellow's political trap in order that I might catch him in my social trap—see?"

"You mean you entrusted him with the seven thousand on purpose that he might appropriate it and so place himself in your power?"

"Precisely. I had ascertained that he was in debt, and calculated that, if his creditors began to press him, he would succumb to the temptation; in which calculation, as the event has proved, I was entirely justified."

"Rather risky, William, all the same," rejoined his cautious better half. "For where would your scheme have been but for the fortunate coincidence which led his creditors to start pressing him at that particular crisis?"

"Trinder's Peptonised Pigs' Feet" laughed outright. "Coincidence? Oh! my dear," he said, when he had recovered from his amusement. "Really, you don't give your William credit for much management. As if I should leave a thing like that to coincidence!"

ART NOTES.

THERE are quite a number of picture shows open at present—some of them interesting. There are, for instance, the works of two deceased painters, both of more than respectable eminence—those of the late Mr. Robert Brough at the Burlington Fine Art Society, and of the late Mr. James Charles, at the Leicester Galleries. Then there is one of caricatures, at the Baillie Galleries in Baker-street, which suggests, for the hundredth time, the absorbing problem whether Mr. Bernard Shaw or Mr. G. K. Chesterton be the most widely illustrated man of the moment. Mr. Chesterton, I may say, is easily first at the Baillie Galleries, but that is only one victory out of many stricken fields. And certainly I have never seen, either in Baker-street or elsewhere, any portrait of Mr. Chesterton that is as wildly and improbably unlike him as was M. Rodin's caricature bust of Mr. Shaw at the International Show—which is, I admit, rather beside the question. Then, at the Fine Art Society's Galleries we have a number of very breezy sea-sketches by Mr. W. L. Wylie—whose paintings always impress me as being among the most potent arguments against the necessity for a Channel Tunnel with which I am acquainted—and water-colours by Mr. E. Wake Cook, whose work always interests me, not because I find it wildly exciting in itself, for, to be frank, I don't, but because Mr. Cook has, in his time, expressed in print very cogent and straightforward views upon "Anarchy in Art," with which I am very largely in agreement.

But of the two exhibitions which interest me most this week, one is that being held at the Whitechapel Art Gallery, and which was opened by Mrs. Holman Hunt on Thursday, and the other is not a picture show at all. It is, or was, a well-advertised determination on the part of certain lady-artists to take part, in their corporate capacity as painters, in a Women's Suffrage procession. I do not know whether their intention was carried out or not. I understand, for one thing, that the weather proved unpropitious, but whether or no, I welcome their intention. Not because I am at all interested in the Suffragettes—who are certainly not artistic, whatever else they may be—but because it shows that there are women-artists of to-day who are not devoid of initiative. I take it for granted, by the way, I trust upon sufficient grounds, that the women-artists in question did initiate the proposal, and did not have it forced upon them by other, more resolute and daring, of their sisters. I am very anxious not to be misunderstood. I do not say that there are no women-painters of to-day who possess initiative. I could mention at least half-a-dozen, one of whom I am credibly informed was observed, during the passing of the Suffrage Procession, surveying her bedraggled sisters from the pavement of the Haymarket with a smile of pitying compassion. But I do maintain that when women-artists collect themselves into a society—from which male artists are excluded—their work seems to lose at once, in general, all the best qualities which may (or may not) attend the artistic efforts of each member in particular—to become, in a word, feeble, timid, and characterless. I have frequently found occasion to say this. Not to labour the point any further, I would suggest that any one who has any doubt on the truth of my statements should visit the exhibition now being held by the Society of Women Artists in Suffolk-street, and judge for him or herself. And that is why I welcome the fact that a number of women-artists gathered into a society, however temporary in its nature, should have mustered up sufficient initiative and energy to determine, even if they did not carry out the determination, upon anything so dashing as a walk from Hyde Park Corner to Exeter Hall upon a muddy afternoon.

It is but a short ride upon a motor-'bus from Exeter Hall to Whitechapel, and I very much hope that some of the artistic demonstrators, having registered their vows of martyrdom at the former classic spot, afterwards journeyed eastward to the Whitechapel Art Gallery. Because if they did, they very likely learned a good deal about one of the directions, at least, in which Art may be made a serious benefit to the community instead of a laughing stock. Nowadays most of us have come to think that the one useful purpose of the word "Art" is to be degraded to the better advertising of some article of commerce to which it can be ever so remotely applied. While the one excuse for the existence of the artist—judging from appearances, as most of us, alas! do—is to paint feeble little pictures which are of no particular use to anybody, to exhibit them in a West End gallery at 1s. entrance fee and sixpence for the catalogue, and trust to the purchases of charitable friends to make a profit out of it. Why anybody, save the artist's friends, should ever pay a shilling to see the pictures exhibited at the average "one-man" or "one-woman" show—I mean, of course, the average of those endless shows by painters whose reputations are not sufficient to make their names familiar to even the small art-loving public—is one of the mysteries of civilisation. Why these same shows are held at all is another. They do not pay the artist; the gallery proprietors will tell you, and who should know better, that they make little or no profit out of them—the public never enters them—try it upon any day subsequent to the "Private View," and you may view them in a state of privacy to which nothing is comparable but the grave. "Vanity, vanity," saith the prophet. And he is right nine times out of ten.

Now if you go to Whitechapel you will find a fine gallery hung with fine pictures, entrance to which is absolutely free. I do not refer only to the present exhibition, but to any of the series which have preceded it and will follow it. You will find not only pictures that are beautiful in themselves and the works of great masters—very probably, also, of great historical interest as well—but if you are one of those whom fortune has not blessed, and whose opportunities for acquiring knowledge have been limited to a Board School, you will find guides who have the subject at their finger tips ready to show you round and explain everything to you in language you can understand, and help you to cultivate the little seed of appreciation of the beautiful which lies dormant in every human bosom. And even if you have not a penny in the world you will be able to afford the entrance fee. You can attend lectures on Art there, into the bargain, if you will. Now that seems to me something like a picture show. It is placed at the service of those who need it most, to whom hitherto the word "Art" has meant nothing; it directs a ray of beauty into the lives of those to whom beauty has been no more than a name; it shows to those who have little chance of learning it elsewhere that there are human ideals higher than those of satisfying the material needs of the body It seems to me that when the Artistic Day of Judgment comes Whitechapel will have a better chance of salvation than all Bond-street taken together, with Burlington House and the New Gallery thrown in as make-weights.

MUSIC.

THE OUTLOOK AT COVENT GARDEN.

THE appointment of Mr. Percy Pitt to succeed M. Messager as musical director at Covent Garden, in conjunction with Mr. Neil Forsyth as general manager, is an important step, which may conceivably mark the beginning of a new era in the history of our only opera house. The qualifications of both Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Pitt are, of course, well known. Mr. Forsyth has long since made himself quite indispensable to the Royal Opera Syndicate as their right-hand business man, while Mr. Pitt has been connected with Covent Garden for several years now as deputy musical adviser, assistant producer, and general utility man, and during that period has won the unqualified respect of all who have come in contact with him on both sides of the curtain. Last year, it will be remembered, he achieved the rare distinction, for a native-born musician, of actually conducting at Covent Garden; he is himself a composer of repute, with thoroughly modern sympathies; he possesses the necessary linguistic powers; and generally there is every reason to believe that he will prove himself fully equal to the duties of his new position. There was always something of an anomaly in having a French composer as musical director of what stands for our national opera house, and on this score alone Mr. Pitt's appointment is matter for satisfaction. It is hardly to be supposed that any epoch-making changes will immediately result, but important developments may be witnessed in the near future, none the less.

The increasing popularity of opera in London has frequently been commented on of late. The advance made during recent years has really been remarkable. Slowly but surely grand opera seems to be making its way as an established institution in London. So far as the regular fashionable season is concerned, little or no anxiety is now experienced. Vast profits may not be realised, but there is no question as to the stability and permanence of the arrangements which have been established, and in the result we are sure of at least three months of grand opera of the highest quality every year. This much accomplished, the rest would seem to be following in the shape of the "extra" seasons given in conjunction with the Royal Opera Syndicate, which have lately become part of the established order of things. First there came the San Carlo Company in the autumn. This year we have had, in addition, a winter season of German opera, and in view of its extension for an additional fortnight, it seems fair to hope that it has been sufficiently successful financially to warrant its repetition next year. Then we are to have, it seems, the Carl Rosa Company in a season of opera in English next Christmas, when, it is said, the whole of "The Ring" will be given for the first time in the vernacular.

Here, therefore, are signs and portents not to be overlooked. We may not have quite reached yet the goal of opera all the year round, but we are certainly getting on that way. Significant progress is being made in another respect also—namely, in the matter of the increasing employment of native singers; and it is an open secret that the present authorities at Covent Garden are quite inclined to go a good deal further in this direction. The difficulties in the way of native vocalists aiming at operatic success are obvious enough. They have to sing in foreign languages; no proper training schools are available for them here; they have to stand comparison with foreign singers representing the pick of all the world, and, in addition, there is the "anti-patriotic bias" to be reckoned with on the part of not a few still convinced that our native singers can never stand in opera against those from abroad. All honour, therefore, to those, such as Mme. Kirkby Lunn and Mme. Agnes Nicholls, who have so successfully fought their way to the front; and all credit also to the management who have given them their opportunities. The sound policy thus well begun must now be followed up and developed.

The claims of British composers, as well as of native vocalists, are also to be considered. In this connection it is interesting to remember that a new work by an English musician will probably be one of the features of the coming grand season in the shape of the winning opera submitted in the Ricordi competition. It will be remembered that a prize of £500 plus 40 per cent. of the performing fees was offered by Messrs. Ricordi, and it is understood that in response there has been received a large number of works, which are being examined at the present time by the appointed judges, to wit, Dr. Richter, M. Massenet, Signor Tito Ricordi, and Mr. Joseph Bennett. One of the conditions of the competition is that "the prize opera will be produced at Covent Garden Theatre during the grand opera season of the year 1907, in accordance with the arrangements made between Messrs. G. Ricordi and Co. and the Grand Opera Syndicate, Limited"; so that unless some unforeseen cause of postponement arises, we may expect to hear the work in the course of the summer. Its production will certainly be an event of no little interest, and one tending emphatically in the right direction. Altogether, therefore, the operatic outlook in London is quite uncommonly encouraging at present.

The German opera performances at Covent Garden continue to prove attractive. On Saturday, for instance, there was an audience which, in point of size, would have done no discredit to the grand season, the work being "Tristan," with Herr van Dyck in his old part of the hero and a new Isolde in Frau Leffler-Burckhardt. Neither can be regarded as completely satisfactory from the vocal point of view, but both are experienced artists who know their work and played up to each other dramatically, with good results. Others in the cast were Mme. Marie Brema (always an admirable Brangäne), Herr Feinhals (a sound Kurwenal), and Dr. Felix von Krauss (once again a dignified and vocally pleasing King Mark). Herr Schalk was the conductor. Earlier in the week an interesting performance was that of "Die Walküre" on Wednesday afternoon, with Mme. Agnes Nicholls appearing as Sieglinde for the first time. By all accounts she did remarkably well. Another feature of this performance was the reappearance of Mr. David Bispham in his old part of Hunding. Here is the right remedy for the afflictions which we suffer at the hands of singers of the Teutonic school. We must grow our own vocalists to replace them.

Truly it never rains but it pours. In addition to the four different seasons of opera which we seem likely to have in the course of the current year at Covent Garden, we are also to have shortly, it appears, a season of German comic opera at the Adelphi Theatre. This is to be provided by the company of the Berlin Komische Opera, who are to be imported en bloc, band and all, and to be heard in such things as Offenbach's "Hoffmann's Erzählungen" (a work which there has been talk of doing at Covent Garden before now), Délibes' "Lakmé," and similar works. According to present arrangements the season will begin about the middle of April, and run for some eight weeks. I hope sincerely that the venture may succeed, but it is difficult to resist misgivings. Comic opera in a foreign tongue makes a somewhat limited appeal—even more so, perhaps, than grand opera. This might be reckoned curious, perhaps, but the explanation is obvious enough. In grand opera the music is the main thing, and the words are of less account; in comic opera the conditions are very different. However, every one will hope that the coming season may prove a success notwithstanding.

Concerts just at present are hardly so numerous as usual at this time of the year, though it would hardly do, perhaps, to count on a continuance of this happy state of affairs. At the first of the Philharmonics last week Mme. Carreño was the bright particular star of the evening, and in that capacity blazed effulgently as ever. Once again she elected to be heard in Tchaikowsky's B-flat minor concerto, and there is probably no pianist living—man or woman—who could have played that brilliant work more brilliantly. Miss Amy Castles was the vocalist, and Mr. Colonne (no competent native conductor being available, it must be supposed) conducted. On Friday the Bach Choir did Parry's "Sinfonia Sacra," entitled "The Love that Casteth Out Fear," a work best described, perhaps, as earnest, Bach's Sanctus in D, and Beethoven's choral fantasia (with Herr Buhlig at the piano); but it was not altogether a very stimulating evening. In the way of chamber concerts there have been performances by the Hans Wesseley Quartet; by Miss Ethel Barns and Mr. Charles Phillips; by Mr. Hans Neumann and Mr. Walter Handel Thorley, and others.

Pianists have been represented by M. de Pachmann, who had a crowded and appreciative audience, as usual, on Saturday, while the Chappell ballad concert was another entertainment on the same afternoon which drew a large audience—Mme. Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Ben Davies, and other well-known artists appearing among the singers, while Mr. Fritz Kreisler contributed violin solos, and Mr. George Grossmith gave a musical sketch. On Monday the London Symphony Orchestra did Beethoven's Mass in D, with the assistance of the Leeds Chorus—a stupendous undertaking, which was accomplished about as successfully as could fairly be expected. For Tuesday, piano recitals by Herr Emil Sauer and Mr. Leonard Borwick were announced, and this evening (Wednesday) the Royal Choral Society are tackling "The Dream of Gerontius."

The announcement that the authorities of the Tottenham Council schools have thought it advisable to put an end to the wholesale teaching of the violin to their scholars on the so-called "Maidstone" principle is one to be noted with satisfaction. Reference has frequently been made in these columns to the absurdity involved in trying to teach the violin in this wholesale manner, and to the undesirable nature of the scheme in other respects, and apparently the authorities in question, after practical experience of it, have come to take the same view. The scheme is one run, it may be remembered, in the interests of a firm of instrument makers, who, to push it, offer a handsome commission to teachers on the violins purchased by the pupils—or rather by their parents—payment for which is usually made on the instalment principle. From the brief reports which have appeared, I gather that it is this instalment arrangement which has had not a little to do with the Council's decision—one member being reported as saying that thousands of homes are destroyed each year in this way. The worthy councillor was doubtless referring to the instalment principle in general here rather than to the particular instance in question, but I can well conceive of any number of happy homes being broken up by the scraping of the youthful scholars upon the cheap instruments so acquired.

The defence offered by the Rev. Dr. Tremlett, Commissary in England of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, U.S.A., in respect of the "degree" of Mus.D. conferred on that eminent musician Mr. J. H. Lewis, of the Guild of Church Musicians, is not very convincing:—

> The University of the South grants Honorary Degrees in absentiâ, as other Universities do, on special grounds only to men eminent in science or literature—not to ordinary scholars. With regard to Dr. Lewis, the late Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Temple), when Bishop of London, recommended Dr. Lewis for the Mus. Doc. degree, and out of consideration to the Bishop's high standing in the Church, the University, being a Church institution, acceded to the Bishop's recommendation and granted the degree.

From this it might be supposed by the innocent that the late Archbishop of Canterbury was the prime mover in the matter, and that the University gracefully conceded the point out of deference to his wishes. Certainly no one would suspect that Dr. Temple could have written afterwards that "Mr. Lewis has obtained a degree which is of no value at all." Nor would it be deduced, perhaps, that it is the practice of the University in question to grant similar degrees to all and sundry on the strength of a bishop's signature—and the payment of the requisite fees.

Friends and admirers in this country of the eminent American composer, Mr. Edward MacDowell, will be glad to learn that favourable progress is being made with the fund which has been instituted to provide for his care and support now that the state of his mental health unhappily precludes him from doing any further work. It was believed at one time that Mr. MacDowell might possibly recover, but seemingly little hope is now entertained of this, and the public has accordingly been called upon to recognise its obligations and come to the support in his affliction of one of America's most richly gifted sons. The committee which has the matter in hand includes the names of some of the most distinguished public men of the day, and there is every reason to believe that by their efforts the wants of the afflicted composer and his dependents will be satisfactorily provided for. Should any of Mr. MacDowell's English admirers feel disposed to contribute, the treasurer of the fund is Mr. E. C. Benedict, 60, Wall-street, New York.

So little has been heard of Humperdinck recently that it is pleasant to read very favourable accounts of his latest work, described as "a musical fairy tale" for soloists, female chorus, and orchestra, entitled "Bübchen's Weihnachts-Traum," which has recently been given in Berlin. We have heard far too little from Humperdinck since "Hänsel and Gretel," and at present he bids fair to go down to posterity, like "Single-speech Hamilton," on the strength of one achievement only.

A good friend of music has passed away in the person of Mr. Thomas Threlfall, whose death was announced last week. Not only as chairman of the committee of the Royal Academy of Music and as chairman of the Associated Board, but in many other ways Mr. Threlfall did much for the encouragement of the art in London, and many an individual performer could testify to helpful advice, and in not a few instances generous assistance received from one whose interest in music was none the less sincere because it was combined with a singularly unostentatious nature.

A trenchant writer in that always informing publication, the Monthly Journal of the International Musical Society, has been falling foul of some of the Aubrey Beardsley illustrations in a recently issued Wagner volume—specimens, as he calls them, of that artist's "immund extravagancy":—

In these unnatural pictures, the stalwart Siegfried's limbs become carrot-like distortions, and his celebrated sword a short fine rapier. Isolde, who wears a tea-gown of to-day, has a body about 10 feet tall to a face about 3 inches long. Venus is nothing but an uncombed wicked-looking dot-eyed little trull. Fricka's figure is like symbolical wall-paper with a face added. All such art is founded on monstrosity, and indicates rather a reversion to savagery than any development of our civilisation. Whatever views are held about some of Wagner's opera-plots, there must have been grave error of judgment to suppose that this decadent style was fit to be associated with them.

What will the Beardsleyites (if such still exist) say to this?

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—I do not know when I have read a more tantalising biography than "The Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn" (1). No doubt Miss Bisland has done what she could to repay in this biography the idolatry of herself expressed in his letters by Lafcadio Hearn; but her merely prefatory life of him gives you only such a silhouette of her subject as his portrait in the frontispiece, while she has not furnished a single note in elucidation of the letters which constitute the bulk of the two volumes. There is, again, the further and greater tantalisation of the fragments of autobiography, which are at once so intrinsically interesting and so exquisitely recounted as to recall De Quincey's famous "Confessions." But neither De Quincey, nor any other English writer of equal genius with Lafcadio Hearn, had such adventures. From the time of his birth in the island of Cerigo, from a Greek mother by an Irish father, to the day of his sudden death in Japan and burial with Buddhist rites as a Japanese citizen, Lafcadio Hearn led something of the life of his remote ancestors, the gipsies. Of this eventful life we get only occasional glimpses, as through scudding clouds, but we see at least enough of it to infer at once its extreme interest and its extreme forlornness. Hearn was, so to say, born a hermit crab with a body shell-less and sensitive, but not without formidable claws. His sensitiveness, I imagine, accounts for his supposed fickleness or ingratitude in dropping suddenly the friends he had adopted enthusiastically—his sensitiveness, and also, as Professor Chamberlain suggests, his idealism. "Friends," says the Professor, "when he first made them, were for him more than mortal men: they stood endowed with every perfection. He painted them in the beautiful colours of his own fancy, and worshipped them, pouring out at their feet all the passionate emotionalism of his Greek nature." Then

"A something light as air, a look,
A word unkind or wrongly taken," or even a failure to worship Herbert Spencer, or to worship him precisely as he ought to be worshipped by the orthodox, would disillusion Hearn with his dearest friend, who was forthwith dropped. He seems, too, to have fallen in and out of love with nations in the same headlong way—with the nation, e.g., which adopted him, with whom he was identified by his marriage, and through his pen—Japan. Perhaps, though, the seeming irreconcilability of his different impressions of Japan arose from the two different Japans of which he was speaking—the old and the new. It was when the old, child-like Japan was passing or had passed into the new that he became disillusioned.

"My conclusion is," he writes to Professor Chamberlain, "that the charm of Japanese life is largely the charm of childhood, and that this, the most beautiful of all race childhoods, is passing into an adolescence which threatens to prove repulsive. Perhaps the manhood may redeem all—as with English 'bad boys' it often does."

Yet his final impression, as expressed in his last letter but one to Miss Bisland, was:—

"I have learned about Japan only enough to convince me that I know nothing about Japan."

This bewildering effect of a deeper study of an inscrutable people reminds me of what Lord Carnarvon said many years ago to a leading journalist who was going over to Ireland to master the Irish Question. "Mr. ——," said his lordship, "after you have been a month in Ireland you will think you know all about it; after you have been two months, you'll know you know nothing"—and the journalist, in reporting the conversation to me, added drily, "I mean to stay a month." But Ireland is an absolutely transparent country as compared with Japan. And the baffling thing is, the more Europeanised the Japanese becomes in culture the less intelligible he becomes to Europeans in character.

"Here," writes Hearn to Hendrick, "is an astounding fact. The Japanese child is as close to you as the European child—perhaps closer and sweeter, because infinitely more natural and naturally refined. Cultivate his mind, and the more it is cultivated the further you push him from you. Why? Because the race antipodalism shows itself. As the Oriental thinks naturally to the left where we think to the right, the more you cultivate him the more strongly will he think in the opposite direction from you. Finis, then, sweetness, sympathy, friendship."

This certainly was Hearn's experience, since he found the adult Japanese so far from sympathetic as to be hostile, and hostile in sly, mean, and nasty ways. It is true that Hearn's supersensitiveness made him impracticable, and that, as Miss Bisland admits, his final resignation of his Japanese professorship was due to a preposterous misconstruction of the accidental intrusion of an English traveller into his class-room; yet even Hearn would not have misinterpreted this intrusion, but for all kinds of previous petty and treacherous Japanese intrigues to oust him from his position. Indeed, there can be no question as to the gross ingratitude towards him of the Japanese Government, and the measure it meted out to him is the measure of what it will mete out to all its Western servants when they have taught it enough to enable it to dispense with them.

"Life will be made wretched for the Occidentals," writes Hearn to Professor Chamberlain, "in business, just as it is being made in the schools, by all sorts of little tricky plans which cannot be brought under law provision, or even defined so as to appear to justify resentment—tricks at which the Japanese are as elaborately ingenious as they are in matters of etiquette and forms of other kinds. The nation will show its ugly side to us after a manner unexpected, but irresistible."

I hardly know how to define the charm of Lafcadio Hearn's letters, and can only say that you, too, are sure to find them absorbing.

If you have had the pleasure of reading "The Cardinal's Pawn" and "Major Weir," you will expect a thrilling story from the same pen; but you will hardly be prepared for the numberless and breathless adventures of the heroine of "The Ark of the Curse" (2). No man would be so unchivalrous as to subject a lady in the condition of the Countess de Beaucens to such frightful perils, privations, and sufferings as she endured among the Cagots and their and her enemies, and you are quite prepared for the sudden turn in the plot due to her child being stillborn. "Our Lady of the Snows'" condition, however, only deepens your sympathy with her sufferings and your interest in her adventures, which, indeed, is so keen that you resent the many passages you have to read over twice to discover their meaning. Miss Montgomery writes so admirably that her occasional lapses into grotesque Meredithese a little irritates you. The motto of Mr. Courlander's powerful and painful "The Sacrifice" (3) might be Waller's

"Women born to be controlled Stoop to the forward and the bold."

"Can a man be too kind?" asks "the poor craven bridegroom" of the novel, and is answered by the girl who finally elopes from him: "Oh, I think so. It's them that has cruel men likes their husbands best." The two men—the magnanimous but feeble creature she marries, and the mere but masterful animal she elopes with—are contrasted with singular power; and though your own masculine sympathies revolt from the brute who carries off the heroine, you are constrained to admit the naturalness of his triumph. The animal scenes and characters of "The Sacrifice"—and most of the scenes and characters are purely animal—are certainly drawn to the life. Mr. Harold Bindloss's "The Dust of Conflict" (4) opens somewhat incredibly with the unnecessary but chivalrous flight of the hero to America; but when he reaches Cuba and plays heroic part in the fighting there, your interest is roused, and grows henceforward to the end. Both the American girl and the heroine are natural and charming, and all ends well through the death in battle of the feeble and futile Tony Palliser. I think you will be interested in the fight about "The Mill" (5) and will be amused by the way in which finally the stubborn Saxon, John Burditch, beat in the battle the Norman bully, Reginald Talbot. The incidental characters, too, are well described, and your interest is kept up at a fair average level throughout.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

"Moltke in His Home" (Murray, 6s. net) is a delightful account of the domestic, social life of the great soldier and statesman. The author, Friedrich August Dressler, has not sought to write a biography of the Field Marshal, or to deal with the historical events in which he played so conspicuous a part. He has been content simply to set down his recollections of Moltke as he knew him in the intimacy of a close friendship, and the result is a most interesting picture of the man as he appeared in his home. The book has been translated by Mrs. C. E. Barrett Lennard, and Lord Methuen, who was also well acquainted with Moltke, contributes an introduction.

To their popular series of little books containing passages from the works of well-known authors, Messrs. Chatto and Windus have now added "The Pocket George Eliot," price 2s. As in previous cases, the selection of the extracts has been made by Mr. A. H. Hyatt.

It is stated that the Rev. R. J. Campbell is writing a book in which he will treat fully of the "New Theology" with which his name is identified. Messrs. Chapman and Hall expect to have the book ready next month.

In his new story, "Beatrice Kavanagh," published by Mr. Edwin Arnold, George A. Birmingham writes of the Gaelic League and other features of Irish life at the present day with the same intimate knowledge that he revealed in his previous novels, "The Seething Pot" and "Hyacinth."

Bentham, J. S. Mill, Cobden, Carlyle, Mazzini, and T. H. Green are the subjects of the collection of essays by Professor John MacCunn, of Liverpool University, which Mr. Edwin Arnold is publishing under the title of "Six Radical Thinkers."

Mr. A. W. àBeckett's "Recollections of a Humourist" will be published this week by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. The author, who was for more than twenty years assistant-editor of Punch, explains that he uses the word "humorist" in the sense that it gives him "the right to be grave or gay as the humour seizes him."

Mr. Francis Miltoun's "Rambles in Provence and on the Riviera," described in a volume just published (7s. 6d. net) by Messrs. Sisley, were accomplished on a motor-car. Like previous travel-books from the same pen, it is pleasant, entertaining reading, neither spoilt by tiresome topographical details, nor overloaded with more or less well-known historical facts. The book is charmingly illustrated in colours and monotone by Blanche McManus.

In "Shakespeare Studied in Six Plays" Mr. Albert S. G. Canning gives an exposition for the general reader of the leading ideas of some of the dramas, those dealt with being "Othello," "Macbeth," "King John," "Richard II.," "Henry IV.," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The book is published by Mr. Unwin, price 16s.

A first novel which is said to be written with unusual power is announced by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett. The new author is Patrick Hood, and "A Jury of the Virtuous" is the title of the book, which deals with the difficulties and temptations which a man once fallen in life has to contend with in retrieving his past. The sadness of the theme is, however, relieved by a charming love story.

Mr. Walter Sichel's singularly interesting biography of "Emma, Lady Hamilton" has passed through several editions since its first publication rather more than a year ago. A new popular edition, price 7s. 6d. net, has now been issued by Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co.

Mr. G. Locker Lampson is the author of a book entitled "A Consideration of the State of Ireland in the Nineteenth Century," which is being published by Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. It gives an account of the social state of Ireland down to the rejection of the second Home Rule Bill, and also discusses the different measures that have been proposed and passed by Parliament in respect of Irish affairs, concluding with several suggestions for the future. Mr. Locker Lampson is a brother-in-law of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—London is awaking from her social lethargy, and it seems as though we are going to have a rather gay season, now that Parliament has opened and brought so many people to town. That it is Lent does not seem to be taken into consideration as it was until some few years ago. Are we becoming an irreligious nation? It would rather seem so. The clergy are much concerned about our Sabbath-breaking, and I see that there was a great ruridiaconal conference near Maidenhead last week on this subject. Maidenhead may be said to be the queen of temptresses towards Sabbath-breaking, so great is the charm of the river just there, and so convenient are the trains on Sunday morning from Paddington.

We were at two dances last week, both held in the handsome Wharncliffe Rooms, where everything is so well done. The first dance was got up for a local object, and was remarkably well organised. There were about four hundred persons present, and both music and floor were capital. The second ball was organised by Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen in aid of the Windsor crèche, Princess Christian giving her patronage. The lovely ballroom looked extremely well, with one end of it arranged as a drawing-room, with a pretty carpet, abundance of flowers, and great palms, with their tubs cleverly draped. For a wonder, there were more men than women, with the consequence that some of the former got no dancing, or hardly any. There should really be a master of the ceremonies at every subscription dance, who could make introductions. He should be a paid official, wearing a badge or uniform by which he would be known to all as the person to whom to apply for partners. I remember one ball at which such an individual officiated. He was extremely useful to both chaperons who wanted partners for their charges and to men who wanted to dance but had no acquaintances in the room. As things are, there are would-be dancers of both sexes who, made eager by the inspiriting music and the gaiety of the scene, can yet do nothing but look on, in the absence of an official M.C.

However, at the Windsor crèche ball, to our astonishment, we met a steward who actually performed the duties of a steward at a ball. He introduced men to girls, and even pronounced quite distinctly the names of each individual—no mean achievement, and a most unusual one. We admired him immensely both for his prowess and his activity. So few young men are active nowadays. The ball was a very great success. The Countess of Dundonald brought a large party, and so did Mrs. Ritchie, the Hon. Mrs. Howard, Mrs. T. R. Drake, and others. Mrs. Cunliffe-Owen managed so well that after deducting the expenses of printing, advertising, band, refreshments, flowers, programmes, and champagne supper, the crèche will receive close on £100. I regard this as a triumph.

A number of people came up from Windsor for the ball, and stayed the night at the Great Central Hotel, of which the Wharncliffe Rooms form a part. I am told that the idea was originated by Princess Christian herself, whose kind heart is greatly interested in the Windsor Crèche.

We went to see the "Morals of Marcus" at the Garrick one evening, and are thinking of writing to ask the manager the name of the sweet that Carlotta eats so enchantingly and so tantalisingly on a sofa while she hums a waltz tune. She tells "Seer Marcoos" that it is nougat, but was nougat ever so appetisingly soft? We thought it must be Turkish delight, such as Quentin sends us sometimes straight from Constantinople, some of which has nice little nutty bits in it. Are you thinking us very greedy? But, then, you have not seen Carlotta eat those bonbons!

Apropos of good things, we went to lunch with a German girl one day last week, who had cooked the whole meal. Why are not we British women equally clever and domesticated? We have never had a better luncheon, and the entire thing was as perfectly served as it was well-cooked. First came a soup called Flädern, after the tiny, very thin pancakes which floated in it; then a risotto of root vegetables, most delicious, afterwards veal cutlets cooked as we had them in Austria a year ago, not bone cutlets, but simply slices browned to a turn. Then a punch-pudding, so-called because flavoured with a little brandy, and quite excellent with a cream sauce served round it. And our hostess, after having cooked the whole thing, helped by a youthful maid, sat down to table as fresh and trim and dainty as possible. We admired her so much.

Girls of the same class in England would scorn to do likewise, which is by no means to their credit. In these days of servant difficulties—now intensified by the Compensation Bill—life would be made much smoother if the daughters in middle-class households would devote their mornings to cookery and other domestic arts. And how much happier these young women would be, too! A little good, honest work done in the morning gives a nice contented flavour to the whole day. Do you not find it so?

There are the K—— girls, four of them, sitting a dead weight on their wretched, overworked father's income, which grows smaller year by year. After breakfast they go into the drawing-room, poke the fire, and sit in easy chairs reading novels, while their poor mother wrestles with the insoluble problem of how to make 9d. do the work of 1s. She has often told me how hard she tries to make servants understand economy and practise it. They set it all down as meanness. And once she said to me, "Madge, I would give anything to see my girls take up some real work in the world, instead of wasting their days as they do in novel reading and bridge-playing. Something to exercise their brains upon." But girls who have been brought up to do nothing are the last to find out the blessings of work.

We were talking about them before Richard one evening, and he asked how many servants they kept. Four, we told him. "And those four plain girls doing nothing all day long." Asked what their lack of beauty had to do with it, Richard was ready. "Because it makes them unlikely to marry. Their father will have to support them until he dies. Why do they not send away three out of the four servants, keeping one to do the rough work, and let the four daughters do the rest?"

Thus Richard. If those young women heard him, how furious they would be. They would call him ever after, "that man," a highly opprobrious term, as you are aware. Whose fault is it? I am afraid it is the mother's. In her unselfishness she wants her girls to enjoy their youth, and it is pathetic to think that she goes quite the wrong way about it, for they are only discontented, restless, and ill-tempered, for lack of the sweetening influence of work.

A spinsters' and bachelors' dance is to be given on the last Tuesday of this month at the Grafton Galleries in aid of the Douglas Nursery in Hoxton. It is rather a novel idea, and is being got up by Miss Sylvia Dale, of 60, Onslow-gardens, S.W., from whom tickets may be had, price 12s. 6d., including a Benoist supper. The company will be limited to two hundred and fifty, so that the gallery will not be uncomfortably crowded for dancing. It ought to be a success. The cause is a good one. The Nursery, a branch of the Christian Social Union Settlement in Hoxton, will be three years old in July, and has done a good and kindly work by taking in daily the children of women obliged to go out to work, and who want their children looked after while they are away. Such a boon to these poor women, who are chiefly widows or deserted wives. The Nursery consists of two wards, one for cot babies and children under a year, the other for toddlers and bigger children. The management is in the hands of an executive committee of ladies. Muriel Viscountess Helmsley, who has taken a great interest in it ever since its start, and who is its most liberal supporter, is chairman, and has formed a West-End Committee to raise money. From this latter, two ladies are proposed to serve on the Executive Committee.

The children are taken care of from 8 a.m. till 8 p.m., and there is also a night ward, with accommodation for twenty babies, much appreciated in special cases. Parents pay 4d. a day for each child, and 3s. 6d. a week for those who remain at night, but, of course, the nursery is maintained entirely by voluntary subscriptions. Everything is economically managed, but wages are a necessarily heavy item, and it is hoped that the Spinsters' and Bachelors' Ball may bring in a substantial sum.

Lady Helmsley is, in addition, getting up a variety entertainment at 33, Belgrave-square on Thursday afternoon, February 28, in aid of the nursery crèche. As Mlle. Jeanne Laurent, Mr. George Grossmith, jun., and Mr. Charles Capper are among those who have generously given their services, it is certain that the room will be full, and the tickets are very cheap, being only 5s. each. They may be obtained of Muriel Viscountess Helmsley, 48, Pont-street.

"Whipstart, uppersnapper," remarked Richard this morning, while reading the paper. "What language are you speaking?" I inquired, whereupon he said, "The only one I know—English. Why do you ask? I am calling some one an upstart and a whippersnapper." This reversal of initial letters is a snare into which some persons fall with peculiar readiness. A friend of ours informed us one day that she had been caking a mound of rawls. It sounded like operations with pastry, but it really meant that she had been making a round of calls. On another occasion, the same friend told her parlourmaid to be very careful in "depanting the court." You guess, of course, that she intended to say, "decanting the port."

I have just discovered the daintiest possible thing in teapots. You know what capital tea the old-fashioned brownware teapots make? But they are rather unsightly and very ill-suited in appearance to the appointments of a lady's teatable. A clever means of obviating this has been invented by Mrs. Wright, in the shape of a handsome silver cover for the humble little brownware pot.

Corset Krutoid.—The latest nouveauté Parisien in tricot forms an elegant and smart up-to-date contour and lengthens the waist line.—Write or call at Mesdames Sykes Josephine, & Co., The Royal Anatomical Corsetières, 280, Regent-street, London.

This cover is fastened on by means of four small screws, and is removable. It presents a very pretty appearance. I saw some at Mrs. Wright's office, 186, Regent-street, one day last week. They are in various designs, one of which, in Indian silver, I very much admired. It would make a lovely lace design. Some are plainer than others, and on some of the lids the handle is covered also with silver. The open-work designs look extremely well with the brown just peering through, and there is a dark blue Doulton teapot with a handsome open-work cover, which is very much admired. These covers need only to be seen to be appreciated. Silver ones never make such good tea as the brownware, and are also much more expensive than these covers, besides being not nearly so pretty. I prophesy a great demand for them.

"I'm dying for a smoke!" said one young man to another at one of the dances we were at. He was rushing along a corridor at full speed in search of tobacco, and I wondered how long he could bear himself without a smoke. I suppose the craving is something similar to what we women have for tea at about five in the afternoon.

We were of the company at a dinner given by the American Circle of the Lyceum Club to the American Rhodes Scholars, and were much interested in the proceedings. The dinner was excellent, a fact which I carefully mention as I have been told that women's clubs are not always up to the mark in this particular. The ice, "biscuit-glacé Pompadour," was delicious. The toasts of the King and the President of the United States having been given that of the American Rhodes Scholars was proposed by Mme. Thayer, President of the American Circle. This lady expects great and beautiful things from these young men. Her thoughts flew like young eagles into the wide empyrean of hope, as she enthusiastically detailed to us the expected achievements of the scholars and prophesied the results that would follow. I watched the faces of one or two of those in whom the president placed such pathetic faith, and I thought to see their countenances express a certain humility, and even deprecation, as they listened. But it was not so. They accepted the whole programme without a doubt or hesitation, either feeling themselves absolutely competent to play the part sketched out, or else treating the lady's hopes and aspirations as a child treats the soap bubbles he blows, knowing that they are charming nothings.

One of the scholars told us in his speech that we have much to learn from America. True, no doubt, but it would have come better from some one else. Being probably struck by the icy silence with which his first remark had been received, our American hostesses being much too courteous to show approval, he added as an afterthought that America had much to learn from us. We were far too polite to applaud, but, like the parrot in the story, we thought the more. It is very interesting to find out what other nations think of us, especially the young ones. Ever since hearing this speech we have been vainly trying to pronounce the words "current" and "thorough" as monosyllables. The speaker did. We really must learn from Americans how to speak English. And they are so sweetly willing to teach us. I was reproved by one dear woman for not saying enn-velope, as she does when she wishes to mention an envelope. It seems that an assistant in the Stores had corrected her English pronunciation of the word and substituted the more usual French sound for the first syllable. All wrong, of course. I think a few series of lessons in the pronunciation of English undefiled, to be given by American professors, would be very valuable. Do you not agree?

"That master of civilised man, the bath-tub." Is not that a telling phrase? It is from a story of American life, "The Builders," by W. C. Emerson, and is noticeable in a setting largely composed of gold mines and robberies and murder. More than one officer who went through hunger, illness, cold, and overpowering fatigues in the Boer War, has told me that the thing that troubled him most was the lack of opportunity or water to have a tub! It seems to be peculiarly the Anglo-Saxon who is a slave to the habit. The Latins are amused and the Teutons indifferent on the point; and really I think their attitude must be the most comfortable and convenient, if not remarkably refined.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Most of us in our schooldays are in hearty agreement with the wise man that "much study is a weariness of the flesh," but later on we do not so readily accept his wisdom in laying down that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit." Or at least we do not feel inclined to act on the idea and avoid vain things, because of the consequent vexation of spirit. Let wisdom say what it will, the world which amuses itself never falters on its way, but pursues vanity with unflagging perseverance. It is always on the rush and the crush, come what, come may; the present is pleasant, let the future take care of itself and the vexed spirit deal with vexation when it approaches. "Seasons" might well be called the times of roses; even over here society shuts out from consideration all but the roseate view of life, and eagerly and zealously, so far as possible, gives itself up to pleasure during the Castle season. Outdoor pastimes, in which hunting plays a large share, by day, dinners, balls and parties of various kinds by night.

The chief entertainment last week at the Castle was the first State ball on Monday night, which was much crowded, the guests numbering over one thousand, or thereabout. They certainly looked to be assembled in more than hundreds. Dancing was at times trying enough to the staying powers of light and airy ball dresses, to say nothing of the tempers of their wearers. How hard it is for a girl to view with indifference the destruction of an arduously thought-out toilette, a dream of loveliness and becomingness, to say nothing of the cost of such a construction! And all through the War Office, against whom ball-goers at Dublin Castle have a really serious grievance! The military element, you know, predominates amongst the dancing men of the British stronghold in Ireland; they attend Castle festivities in uniform. The War Office, with grim humour, commands that the spurs of active service must be worn, by all entitled to wear spurs, in the ball-room. The spurs certainly do very active service in crowded dances. The new "Court" arrangement of St. Patrick's Hall, with the throne removed from the top to the side of the room, spoils the effect of the hall, and is awkward for dancing. On Monday night dancing took place in two rooms, and the entire suite of apartments was thrown open for refreshments, supper, and sitting out. Whatever drawbacks there might have been with regard to dancing, the scenic effect was brilliant. There was a large Viceregal party, amongst whom were Lady Desborough, Lord Portsmouth, Lady Wicklow, Lady Margaret and Miss Proby, Ladies Violet Brabazon, Louisa Longley, Kenmare, Dorothy and Cicely Browne, the Misses Margaret and Alice Carr Glyn. Many lovely dresses were worn, with brilliant embroideries, and softly silky of texture. And what an ornament hair is now to our sex! The amount worn by everyone, young and old, suggests that woman, in many cases, has learned, helped by the latest resources of civilisation, to crown herself with the crowning glory of a fine head of hair. The Victorian head of the plainly braided period grew no such profusion of hair. How "skimpy" were the ringlets of our grandmothers compared with the thick, waving, and fluffy tresses of their granddaughters. One hopes that all the strength of the wearers does not go into these haloes of hair, though in extreme cases it sometimes looks as if the head were entirely given up to its outside adornment. Lady Granard brought her daughters, so also did Ladies Mowbray and Stourton, Clinton, O'Neill, Stopford, Plumer, Butler, Arnott, Nixon, and many others. The ladies of the Viceregal household included Ladies Haddo, Hawkesbury, Celia Coates, Powerscourt, Clementine Waring, Lady MacDonnell, and Miss MacDonnell. Lord and Lady Grenfell were obliged to cancel all their engagements, owing to the sad death of Lady Victoria Grenfell, who was married to Lord Grenfell's nephew.

On Tuesday evening Lord and Lady Aberdeen, with a large Viceregal party, attended a charity ball for one of the numerous fine hospitals of Dublin, the entertainment being in every way a brilliant success. Sir John and Lady Arnott's ball took place on Wednesday, in their new house in Merrion Square. This residence of the Gort family in old days, and then of Lord Ashbourne, is one of the finest, or perhaps the finest, in Merrion Square. The house, which has been newly done up, was beautifully decorated for the occasion. Lord and Lady Aberdeen, with a large Viceregal party and staff, were present, and, of course, the elect of society were assembled to have the honour to meet their Excellencies. Many beautiful dresses were worn, and many diamonds and other jewels. Lady Arnott was a charming hostess, and received much help from her pretty twin daughters in doing the honours of the occasion. A big dinner on Thursday at the Castle was followed by a small dance. These small dances—the guests numbering some hundreds—are indeed the cause of much vexation of spirit. Such grumbling about favouritism—justifiable, too. The same girls invited over and over again, and equally charming ones never asked at all. One wonders why such a reformer as Lady Aberdeen does not see to everyone having a turn and rigorously exclude the guests of the first small dance from the second, and so on. How many heartburnings, and even youthful tears, it would save! For little things are great to little men, including women. But indeed it seems no little thing to a girl to be deprived of expected opportunities for herself and her best frocks, and not alone that, but to see double quantities given to the other girls. Oh, these others! Which of us has philosophy enough to suffer gladly their getting our share as well as their own? Is it not the same with everything?—Yours ever,

CLARE.

Now that Lent is here, try these fillets of haddock à la Raymond:—

Fry a sliced onion with 2 tablespoonfuls of salad oil, mix a dessertspoonful of flour with water, to make half a pint of sauce, simmer it 20 minutes with a bouquet of herbs and rough vegetable, and then strain it. Put the sauce into an earthenware casserole and arrange the fillets of haddock in a circle on it, season it with salt and pepper, put 4 large, ripe tomatoes, with the skins and seeds removed, in the centre with a chopped pimento, cover all closely, and cook it in a hot oven for half an hour. Serve it with a napkin pinned round the casserole.

Rolled sandwiches à la Norvégienne are just the thing for "Bridge" suppers:—

Drain half a tin of Lax, pound it with the yolk of a hard-boiled egg and an ounce of butter, season it with a dust of cayenne, a few drops of lemon juice and chili vinegar, and rub it through a wire sieve. Spread the purée carefully on slices of new bread and butter, sprinkle it with chopped capers, trim and roll them very neatly. Dish the sandwiches prettily on a napkin and garnish them with mustard and cress.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

SUCCESS OF DR. ALABONE'S TREATMENT.

Testimony, to the success of the above treatment, is still being received from those who have experienced its benefits, and hundreds of instances occur of recoveries, even after patients have been discharged from Chest Hospitals as "incurable." Many medical men, it is interesting to note, have not been slow to acquaint themselves with this method of cure, which has done so much for the cause of the consumptive, and are practising it with the most satisfactory results, as the following letter, taken from numerous others, will show :—

To the Editor of the Christian World:

Dear Sir,—I append the record of a case treated by Dr. Alabone's methods. Alice A———, a housemaid, aged twenty-two years, has lost two brothers in Consumption. She was attacked with the disease early in 1892, with consolidation in the apices of both lungs, had flattening below each clavicle, repeated blood spitting, prolonged expiration, severe cough, rapid and continuous loss of flesh, night sweats, etc.

Ordinary treatment gave no benefit. I put her on Dr. Alabone's treatment, and after about three weeks she began to steadily improve, and she was at the end of six months perfectly well, and is so still.

I am now treating her brother for tubercular ulceration of the stomach with his remedies, and although only a few weeks have elapsed, he is, I believe, improving.

Faithfully yours,

F. C. F——, L.R.C.P., L.R.C.S., L.M.

We would recommend those of our readers who may unfortunately be suffering in Consumption to write to Dr. Alabone for particulars of his treatment, which he has kindly consented to send on application.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

SPRINGTIME.

H. C. BAILEY'S NEW NOVEL. 6s.

"The author of 'My Lady of Orange' and 'Beaujeu' has capped all his previous successes with a veritable triumph. 'Springtime' makes us laugh at frozen pipes. Its welcome will reach the summer, and will probably outlast many winters and summers. Mr. Bailey's story is bubbling over with the same light-hearted gaiety and romantic charm that made the success of Mr. Harland's 'Cardinal's Snuff-box' and Mr. Egerton Castle's 'Young April.' In wit it sparkles like the former, in movement it outdoes the latter, and in presenting the gallant spirit of youth it equals both."—Morning Post.

LUCAS CLEEVE'S Powerful New Novel

HER FATHER'S SOUL [This day.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

 Competent critics, who have read the novel in proof, declare it to be the finest piece of work Lucas Cleeve has done, and there is little doubt it will take its place among the books of the season. Order it to-day.

TWO GREAT CONTROVERSIAL NOVELS

AMAZEMENT By James Blyth 6s.

The opinion of the PALL MALL GAZETTE:—"'Amazement,' by its title, but faintly expresses the emotions with which it will be read. By the marriage law reformer it will be welcomed as a brilliant yet scathing indictment of the existing system, and apart from its motive, the critical must admit the richness of its humour, its faithfulness to life, and its sound literary quality. Mr. Blyth has never produced work which is cleverer. The character drawing and character contrasts betray unusual skill and finished artistry. Mr. Blyth has built up a strong case for the reform of our marriage and divorce laws, and 'Amazement' must be regarded as one of the strongest novels of the season."

THE YOKE By Hubert Wales

Author of "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers." ... 6s.

 Now and then a novel is issued which stands conspicuously forth as being of different mould to all others, and readers turn to it with avidity. Such was "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers," a first book by Mr. Hubert Wales, which straightway achieved distinction. In his new novel, "The Yoke," he displays a more startling originality and an even greater freedom. It may be in venturing to issue it the publisher will incur some adverse criticism, but be that as it may it will undoubtedly let loose the dogs of controversy.

A REMARKABLE BOOK ON THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E, the distinguished authority on Hygienic Science and Health Questions, is evidently a believer in Thomas Carlyle's doctrine that there is no utility in pointing out misfortunes unless you at the same time indicate the remedy. In his remarkable little book, "The Art of Living," just issued from the press, Dr. Wilson not only points out that "Our first duty to ourselves is to check illness at the outset," but he follows up this admonition with the more welcome information how we are to do it. He, so to speak, says: "You have the evil of ill-health to fight. Now, here's the weapon to fight with. Strike for freedom." For example, he says: "Suppose a person has run down—feels languid and is easily tired. If he neglects this warning—for all such signs and symptoms are Nature's warning to us—the possibility is that he will pass further afield into the great lone land of disease. Can he do anything to save himself from such a disastrous result? In the vast majority of cases he can restore his vigour." How? Dr. Wilson tells his reader how without delay, adding at once this remarkable statement: "Probably he will be advised to take a tonic. This in the main is good advice. Unfortunately the number of tonics is legion, but if there exists any preparation which can combine in itself the properties of a tonic and restorative, and which at the same time can contribute to the nourishment and building up of the enfeebled body, it is evident such an agent must prove of the utmost value to everybody. I have found such a tonic and restorative in the preparation known as Sanatogen." How the distinguished author found this tonic he tells us in an interesting bit of autobiography. "Recovering from an attack of Influenza," he says, "and suffering from the severe weakness incidental to that ailment, Sanatogen was brought under my notice. I gave it a fair trial, and the results were all that could have been desired. In a short time my appetite improved, the weakness was conquered and without the use of any other medicine or preparation I was restored to health." It is easy to believe that this experience led the doctor to make a thorough investigation into this specific which had served him so well. Sanatogen, he tells us, "combines two distinct elements, one tonic and the other nutritive." Further, it is no "secret" remedy, for, as he pertinently observes: "Its composition is well known, otherwise medical men would not prescribe it." What the tonic and nutritive elements of Sanatogen are and how they effect so much good Dr. Wilson describes in simple, convincing terms. The whole passage is too long to quote, but one important remark of the writer may be given, namely, that one of the principal elements of Sanatogen "represents the substance which actually forms a very important, if not the most important, constituent of our brain and nervous system." How, through regenerating the nervous system, Sanatogen restores the functions of the digestive organs, and by rebuilding the tissues compensates the wear and tear of latter-day life; how it does away with the need of stimulants, and cures the sick by the natural method of making the body strong enough to drive out disease—all this, in the delightful style of Dr. Wilson's language, makes engrossing and pleasant as well as instructive reading. This last contribution of Dr. Wilson to the literature of Health may certainly be calculated to carry joyful news to the ailing and weary. A limited number of complete specimen copies of the "Art of Living," by Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., are being distributed free of charge. To obtain one of these copies the applicant must mention "TRUTH" in sending his name and address to the Publishers—F. WILLIAMS & Co., 83, Upper Thames St., London, E.C.

OUR PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons, no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a Quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed 12, and must under no circumstances consist of more than 14, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret-street, Queen Anne's-gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES No. 1,457 and 1,458.

The awards in these two competitions will be announced next week.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,464.

The pun, or play upon words, is admittedly not the highest form of wit; still, if smart and appropriate, it is capable of producing considerable amusement, and adding something to the gaiety of nations.

One of the cleverest punning rejoinders on record was perpetrated by the celebrated Dean Mansel under the following circumstances:—He was dining with the head of a certain college at Oxford, and the latter, while carving a fore-quarter of lamb, spilt some of the gravy on the cloth.

"Pish, filthy mess," ejaculated the carver, annoyed by his own clumsiness.

"Hardly that, my dear Doctor;" replied the Dean, "but it is certainly lamb-on-table."

I have told this somewhat hoary anecdote in order to make clear to competitors the sort of thing I have in my mind, when I offer, this week, the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

The Best Example of a Smart and Appropriate Punning Rejoinder.

Such examples need not be original; though if at once original and witty, why so much the better. The only essential condition is that they should be rejoinders, and so, of course, should embody the remark that leads up to them. Subject to this condition, competitors are given an entirely free hand.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) No Competitor should send in more than one example.

(ii.) All examples must reach Truth Office by the first post on Monday, February 25, at latest.

N.B.—From time to time I receive complaints from competitors of misprints in their solutions. Now in many, if not in most cases, such misprints are primarily due to lack of precision in the handwriting of competitors themselves.

May I, therefore, in the friendliest spirit possible, point out to those concerned that by the exercise of a little extra care in this direction they will be doing a real kindness both to the printers and myself, and, at the same time, will save themselves much unnecessary vexation.

Ethna.—I much regret that your solution of Puzzle No. 1,460 was received too late for inclusion in the competition.

Maran.—Your name and address duly noted.

Aster.—I note your correction of printer's error; much obliged to you for pointing it out.

Rimabel.—Many thanks for your letter. I have substituted the "o" for the "is." I rather agree with your comments.

Neale.—You are still eligible for part of a Prize, to an amount not exceeding the difference between what you have already won and the full Two Guineas.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,461.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

SENTENCES OF NOT MORE THAN THIRTY WORDS, CONTAINING THE GREATEST NUMBER OF "SPOONERISMS."

When Pipe Pous was Rope of Pome, the Nuke of Dorfolk, with call tandle and fare beet, appeared. He offered himself bowl and sody to defend the Foman Raith.—Mac.

Vicar addresses committee of ladies on the subject of a projected poor children's tea party:—Say we open with key and toffee (tea and coffee), sandwiches—not the stale way ration (railway station) variety—then jamson is dam (damson is jam) well liked by youngsters. Work early, ladies, if only as late players (plate layers).—Kingston.

THE HUSBAND'S FAREWELL.

No time to be tost (time to be lost!) Put the cabbage on the lug (luggage on the cab), sake your teats (take your seats), tippy shall have a cab (cabby shall have a tip); I'll kiss the misses (miss the kisses), but you'll hit hard at your nose (knit hard at your hose.")—Ox Short.

Gentleman, the noble duke is here to-night, and it is now my proud privilege to beseech His Brace of Geese—I mean His Grace of Beestminster, to address you.—Aichdoubleu.

I ask the assistance of my hung helpers (young helpers) on behalf of a home for the duff and demb (deaf and dumb). Blokes and cooks (clooks and books) will be acceptable, and the friends badly feed nun(d)s (need funds).—Caeren.

Quotation from the speech of an irate shareholder at a general meeting:—"Were at a lead devil: the Maud beating considers the hair-shoulders silk mops. In future I'm going in for flaps and shots. I've had enough of shocks and stares!"—Hilly.

I saw Jack kiss Mattie and Pollie at the Shower Flow, but the girls went blushing through the rooms of rice-coloured noses, and soon there were titters at sea. (I saw Jack, Miss Kattie, and Pollie at the Flower Show, but the girls went rushing through the blooms of nice coloured roses, and soon there were sitters at tea.)—Nerno.

What the "Spoonerist" means to say:—When the rector speaks, bidding men no longer sleep in crime, he lifts above life's dusty levels the worshipping horde of ladies, cautious nurses, keen lads, and gentle maids. What he said: When the spectre reeks, bidding men no longer creep in slime, he lifts above life's lusty devils the worshipping Lord of Hades, nauseous curses, lean cads and mental jades."—Bandbox.

After buying a package of eggs and some new-laid pegs she churned into the church and heard the text, "Out of the fullness of the mouth the heart speaketh." Correct Version: After buying a package of pegs and some new-laid eggs, she turned into the church and heard the text, "Out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh."—Ethna.

I love to wield a fork; to meet perchance a brown fig box, or perhaps a squirrel popping on its tiny drawers, and I so dote on tipsy gents! (Walk afield, big brown fox, dropping on its paws, gipsy tents.)—Thersites.

"Yahoo, Christen with curdly tea, the lucifers of Nancy and perspire with a negress the fat man of pope, to end at the hysterics of a racy lass of Ibsen's Ayah."* Which, please note, is "Spoonerism," for "Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope . . . attend to the history of Rasselas (prince) of Abyssinia." Sincerite.

* "Ayah" is an East Indian nurse, the Italian word for governess.

Whilst hunting over my grounds, and mildly cursing the wire, a big fox rushed through bogs and ditches, finally upsetting a gipsy tent. "Now I'm bagged," said the fox. The alternative sentence reads thus:—Whilst grunting over my hounds, and wildly cursing the mire, a fig box rushed through dogs and bitches, finally upsetting a tipsy gent—"now I'm fagged," said the box.—Lorna.

Smith has a horrible rabbit (roarable habit) of faking maces (making faces); his flastic pace (plastic face) shakes extraordinary tapes (takes extraordinary shapes); he wets his life (lets his wife) hake their mouse (make their house) a home for shaifs and ways (waifs and strays) and domeless hogs (homeless dogs).—Oiseau.

An old cricketer was once asked for advice on bowling, and this is what he said:—"A bird on the wall—the bricket call. He holes with his bed who coals for batches; thus battling rate, with bands round their hats, are bought and cold." This is what he intended to say:—"A word on the ball—the cricket ball. He bowls with his head who bowls for catches. Thus rattling bats, with hands round their bats are caught and bowled."—Fondrads.

A tree-sipper, track of all jades, city crises meal rashers with bright leeches, cockey Japs, and stalking wicks, for trailing hams for mummer's plates, mug-rakers and tar-lenders. The above should read:—A sea-tripper, Jack of all trades, criticises real mashers with light breeches, jockey caps, and walking-sticks, for hailing trams for plumber's mates, rug-makers and bar-tenders.—Eggs.

In a nosy cook, we had a sight lupper of peat-matties, hainty dam sandwishes, keak and stidney pie, some stink puff (called manc-blange), cea, toffee and binger geer.—Difisel.

She: Nice wedding, Mr. Downy? He: Just a slit bow, eh what! Reglar country spread, don't yer know. Lots of arming chaces, rippers and slice and tarty hosts, eh what!—Erinne.

Mrs. Malaprop remarks:—"These two neologies seem to me to far ant tether paint Saul and his wee frill. Pappily no heart of the old Gospel bray can be eaten out.—Trebor Nitram.

After fighting the liars and sewing the people into their sheets, he boiled his icicle, hushed his brat, and running straight as the fly crows, jumped into the fowh-drain.—Glenrosa.

Lecture to students:—"Gentleman, you really must be more punctual in your attendance, having tasted two worms already, and it is annoying always to see rooms of beery wenches."—Hatter.

Traveller to Porter:—I have two rags and a bug. Find me a nosey little cook in the town drain. I also want a bath of milk and a glass bun.—Wooge.

Mother (rather late for train) to daughter:—Just hush my brat; put a dog and foal on the lire; order a good dupe for sinner, and give me my bed rag and red bug. Good guy, burly!—Nurse.

At a christening of twins, the mother being greatly flustered, gave their names as "Steak and Kidney." The bewildered clergyman turned to the husband, who explained she meant "Kate and Sidney."—Dullard.

The Minister said:—In the country of the Gergesines the brine ran violently into the swine. He should have said the swine ran violently into the brine (or sea).—Canning.

A clergyman addressed his congregation in the following manner:—I must kindly ask my parishioners to keep to their own seats and not to occupew other people's pies.—Jem.

Let us find a nosy little cook (cosy little nook), and thought I am as cross as a hoe (hoarse as a crow), I will bry my test (try my best) to tell you a tipping little rail (ripping little tale) I heard.—New Zealander.

A WROUGHT SHOW.

Whop a stile and hear the toll hidings. We went to rake up the liver by bow wrote when by crashing a cab I hurt the ball of the smack. Solution:—Stop a while and hear the whole tidings. We went to lake up the river by row-boat when, by "catching a crab," I hurt the small of the back.—Dick Maisch.

Mrs. Muddlit (loq.):—"Yes, Shakespeare's 'Shaming of the Trew,' 'Winter's Night,' and 'Twelfth Tale,' are nice enough, but give me something by Thickens or Dackeray—Thackens or Dickeray—I mean Dackens or Thickeray!"—Hardie.

After pacing for a round cake we decided to balk a wit, but, unfortunately, I was hired of Tim and te(a) was hired of me, so we both went home. (After racing for a pound cake we decided to a walk a bit, but, unfortunately, I was tired of him and he was tired of me, so we both went home.) Porthos.

Flurried Doctor:—Be sharp with a light; here's a max of botches. Reach the pumach stump. quick.

A FOOTBALL MATCH.

The Work of the Clerks:—The winter of the spring bricked the light rack, and, shutting in a pot, the breezy gall ripped in the whigging for the sinning wide. Translation:—The Clerk of the Works: The sprinter of the wing tricked the right back, and, putting in a shot, the greasy ball whipped in the rigging for the winning side.—Felixicus.

A lady, in describing a wedding, said:—"A dell-pressed wage tearing her brain, Marry was carried to Black Jacket, who was pressed like a deer of the Louse of Hordes. The merry sonny was a sand green." She should have said:—"A well-dressed page bearing her train, Carry (Carrie) was married to Jack Blacket, who was dressed like a peer of the House of Lords. The ceremony was a grand scene."—Watermain.

RHYMED LINES OF VAGARIES OF ENGLISH VERBS.

 I this week give a few more Vagaries of English Verbs.

A WINTER HOUSE-PARTY.

What a jolly house-party we were,
What frolics we started at once,
Every day such a stir as we stare,
At night what gay dances we dunce.

All the motorists thought it was nice
To motor all day—so they mote,
Then, when frost floored the lake with hard ice,
The skaters took skates and they skote.

But some others, to skaters amaze,
Declared they would slide, so they slode,
While the lazy ones thought they would laze,
With nothing to do, which they dode.

Bel Demonio.

THE TRAVELLERS.

The wind was beginning to blow and it blew,
Then we thought it was likely to snow and it snew;
We tried from the blizzard to fly and we flew,
But suspecting our horses might shy, and they shew,
We deemed it more prudent to hide and we hid,
Yet determined once more to ride on and we rid.
Jack cried, "Where's a tavern? Let's think!" and we thought;
As we reached it we gasped, "Let us drink!" and we drought.
Our hearts had been sinking, and well nigh had sunk,
But we quickly felt able to wink, and we wunk;
Then ventured to draw near the hearth and we drew,
When we heard someone shout, "Why, it thaws!" and it thew.

Redder.

THE SUFFRAGETTES.

Oh, was it a dream? How could I have dreamt
Of a stream of fierce women, who rapidly streamt
Past a beaming policeman who no longer beamt
As he heard the wild scream they constantly screamt?
So it seems—it could only have seamt
In a dream, which I certainly dreamt.

West Wind.

He wanted a song to sing, and he sang
Of a message he had to bring, which he brang,
Said to hope he ever would cling, and he clang;
But I told him "Enough"—that would do—and it did,
And that he'd better go, and he gid.
But it began soon to blow, and it blew
So that I thought it would snow, and it snew;
Then I feared he might freeze, and he froze,
And began very badly to sneeze, and he snoze,
Until a hot drink I gave him to take, which he took,
Then slept till I thought he never would wake, but he wook,
And said he felt fit to bake, though he had never been book.

The Handy Home Remedy.

A box of BEECHAM'S PILLS should always be kept in the house, as, like a "stitch in time," they may save much future worry and expense. On the first sign of any derangement of the system a dose should be taken, and they will invariably have the most beneficial effect. "Prevention is better than cure," we are told. Next time you feel "out of sorts," just take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS, and so prevent a seemingly small ailment growing into serious trouble. BEECHAM'S PILLS prevent illness as well as cure it. Most people take them to keep themselves in good health. These are wise and happy ones—they hardly ever know what ill health is.

There is no medicine in the world to compare with

BEECHAM'S PILLS

They will not harm the most delicate—and the strongest will benefit by using them. They are a tried remedy—the trusted friend of thousands of families all over the world.

Women especially suffer from headache, backache, loss of energy and spirits, Nervous Dyspepsia and many other ailments which make life almost unbearable. Every woman can be immediately relieved of this suffering if upon the first sign of derangement she will take a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1573. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, February 20, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, *which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. ENTRE NOUS.

WITH reference to the coming inquiry into the case of Mr. Edalji, Mr. J. H. Richardson, of the Daily Telegraph, told me on Monday that he had received in subscriptions up to that time about £200. Although this is a good beginning, it will be readily understood that £200 will not go far towards meeting the inevitable expense of presenting Mr. Edalji's case to the Committee of Inquiry as it should be presented if justice is to be done. I venture, therefore, to repeat the appeal I made last week for subscriptions for this important public purpose. Please note that it is a public purpose, for whatever individual sympathy may be felt with Mr. Edalji, it is of personal interest to every member of the public that the important questions raised by his case with regard to the administration of justice, and the share of the police and the Home Office in it, should be fully discussed and threshed out to a satisfactory conclusion. All who have read what has appeared in Truth on the subject will appreciate this, and I hope that all will show their appreciation by sending their subscriptions, large or small, either to me or to Mr. Richardson at the Daily Telegraph Office.

It was announced in Truth several weeks ago that two full-dress dinner parties would be given at Buckingham Palace this month, and the first of these entertainments took place on Saturday evening, about forty guests having been invited by the Master of the Household.

There was a very full Levee on Thursday, with a crowded entrée, and a large attendance of the Corps Diplomatique. The arrangements, however, are now so good and so complete that the ceremonial was comfortably got through with a rapidity which would have astounded the Court officials in the old days. Everything is now managed at St. James's Palace vastly better in all respects than in the last reign. The King was a few minutes late in entering the Throne Room, as his Majesty received several individuals in the Royal Closet directly after his arrival at St. James's Palace. Before the Levee the King invested Mr. Frederick Graham, of the Colonial Office, with the Second Class (K.C.B.) of the Order of the Bath, and Mr. Whitmore Smith with the Second Class (K.C.I.E.) of the Order of the Indian Empire, and they were both knighted by his Majesty.

The Queen will pay a semi-state visit to the City early in June, when her Majesty is to open the bazaar which is to be held at the Mansion House in aid of the Lord Mayor's fund on behalf of crippled children. It is expected that this bazaar will be opened on the second day by the Princess of Wales.

The Devonport and Stonehouse Town Councils refused last week to vote any public money for the decoration of the streets on the occasion of the public visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Three Towns. It is stated that the civic bodies at both Devonport and Plymouth have been most pointedly ignored by the naval and military authorities who have made all the arrangements, and the result of this ungracious conduct is the vote to which I have referred. At Plymouth there is much grumbling because the Prince of Wales declined to receive an address from the Corporation, although he is High Steward of the Borough, so it has been decided there also that no public expense for decorations is to be incurred. The Prince appears to have expressed a wish that the Royal visit should be regarded as strictly private, and his desire will be gratified.

It is unfortunate that there should have been such tracasseries, and the fact is that the Royal visit cannot reasonably be looked upon as otherwise than public, inasmuch as the object is to open works which have cost the country some six millions, and the ceremony is therefore one of national importance. There was none of this fiddle-faddle when the King and Queen visited the Three Towns in March, 1902, and their Majesties were received everywhere with the utmost enthusiasm, every street through which they passed being profusely decorated.

The Westminster Gazette announced last week that "great preparations are being made at Floors Castle, the seat of the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, for the expected visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales during the coming summer." This is all nonsense. No "preparations" of any sort or kind are being made at Floors, and no visit from the Prince and Princess of Wales is expected during the summer. As to the redecoration of the castle and the installation of the electric light—which the Westminster Gazette supposes to be now going on—all that work was carried out shortly after the Duke's marriage. It is quite likely that the Prince and Princess of Wales will be guests at Floors either this year or next year, but their visit will not take place in the summer. They will go to Floors in October, when excellent salmon fishing is usually obtained on the Duke's celebrated waters in the Tweed. The Prince and Princess are to be the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch at Dalkeith Palace, near Edinburgh, during the second week in July, and the fiction about their going to Floors may have originated in some confusion between the two places.

Princess Louise has been on a visit to Lord and Lady Yarborough for a few days at Brocklesby Park, Lincolnshire, where some Royal guests will be entertained during the last week of June for the Royal Agricultural Society's show at Lincoln. Brocklesby is a large red-brick house of irregular architecture, which has been improved since the fire of 1898, the east wing having been rebuilt, and new terraces made from designs by Mr. R. F. Blomfield. The hall, staircase, and gallery are fine, and the house contains a few good pictures (Old Masters), and the celebrated Aufrere collection of sculpture. The charming gardens are noted for some splendid cedars of Lebanon. The deer park is large and well wooded, and contains the family mausoleum, which was built by Wyatt in 1794. The thorns in the park are remarkable for age and size.

A weekly contemporary announces that several of the Paris friends of the King and Queen have been invited to pay a visit to Sandringham "shortly." As a matter of fact, no more company will be received at Sandringham until the beginning of November. The Queen, who has been expected at Sandringham for a few days, will probably go there on Saturday, returning to town on Tuesday evening, and her Majesty will not return again into Norfolk until the autumn. Last year the Queen spent part of the summer at Sandringham, as she wished to be in the country as much as possible, owing to her mourning for King Christian.

The King has appointed Mr. George Ronald Lane to be a Page of Honour to his Majesty, in the place of Mr. Victor Spencer, only son of Lord Churchill, whose term of employment in that capacity has expired. Mr. Lane is the only son of Sir Ronald Lane, Lieutenant-Governor of Chelsea Hospital, and he is a nephew of the Dean of Rochester. The Lanes of King's Bromley are one of the oldest families in Staffordshire, and they were always staunch supporters of the Stuarts.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen were present at a memorial service for Lady Cadogan during last week at the Castle Chapel. They also attended a meeting of the Irish Industries' Association, at which both Lord and Lady Aberdeen made graceful speeches in allusion to Lady Cadogan's work in the cause of the association, which owed its origin to Lady Aberdeen, who started it during Lord Aberdeen's first term of office as Viceroy of Ireland. This week visitors are being entertained at Dublin Castle, where the second Levee and Court of the season are fixed for the same day. The usual dinners and dances will follow the Court ceremonials on succeeding days.

The annual conference of the National Liberal Federation is to be held this year at Plymouth, probably about Whitsuntide, and it is hoped that the Prime Minister may be able to attend on one day, in which case Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman will probably be the guest of Lord and Lady Clifden at Lanhydrock, near Bodmin, during his stay in the West of England.

Lord Allendale was the head of one of the richest and most powerful families in the North of England. The Beaumonts were for centuries settled in Yorkshire, but their principal estates were obtained by the marriage of Colonel Beaumont in 1758 to the daughter of Sir Thomas Wentworth, who had large estates in the West Riding, and in Northumberland, including the lands of the Blackett family. A Beaumont has sat almost continuously as one of the members for Northumberland since 1798, and Lord Allendale was a member of the House of Commons for forty years. He is said to have refused a peerage from Mr. Gladstone. He seldom spoke, as he had not inherited his father's oratorical powers, but he earned a great Parliamentary reputation as a most useful man on Committees. Lord Allendale exercised immense influence on the Liberal side in Durham and Northumberland, but he always worked quietly.

The first wife of Lord Allendale was Lady Margaret De Burgh Canning, youngest daughter of the late Lord Clanricarde, who was described by competent critics as "the most agreeable woman in England, and one of the cleverest." She was a perfect hostess. In her time Bretton Park, the family place near Wakefield, was the scene of much brilliant and delightful hospitality, and invitations to the numerous parties entertained there were greatly coveted. It was, indeed, one of the most comfortable houses in England, apart from the attraction of a pleasant host and a hostess who was one of the very best examples of a grande dame, with remarkable powers of conversation, and a gift of repartee which was hereditary in her family.

Lord Allendale was one of the largest landowners in Durham and Northumberland, and he was also a great mineral proprietor both in those counties and in the West Riding. In 1874 he increased his territorial possessions by purchasing the Dilston estate, near Hexham, from Greenwich Hospital, the price being about £280,000. The immense fortune of this family is principally due to the famous "W. B." lead mines in Allendale, which came to the Beaumonts from the Blacketts. For many years the revenue from these mines drawn by Lord Allendale's father and himself averaged £100,000 a year. The mines were greatly developed towards the close of the eighteenth century by the skilful management of the famous "Madame Beaumont," who rebuilt the stately house at Bretton. Once Mr. Pitt was dining with her, and he admired her splendid display of plate. She replied: "That is all lead mines," on which he remarked: "Dear me, I thought it was silver," and went on talking, without allowing her to explain.

Lord Allendale succeeded to his vast property when a minor, and the last of the great baronial entertainments at Bywell Castle took place when he came of age in 1850. His Parliamentary career commenced two years later, when he was returned for South Northumberland.

The Exchequer will not benefit so largely as might have been expected by the death of Lord Allendale, as his estates in Northumberland and Durham were made over to his eldest son in 1894, and it is understood at Wakefield that the Bretton estates have also been transferred to the new peer. Lord Allendale had been very rarely seen in the North since his public life terminated in 1892, and he had since resided principally at his house in Piccadilly.

Rear-Admiral Raby, who died last week at Southsea, where he had resided for nearly thirty years, served in the Crimea in the trenches during the most critical period of the war for eleven months. He performed an act of gallantry during the attack on the Redan in September, 1855, which gained him the Victoria Cross. Rear-Admiral Raby afterwards did good work for several years in the suppression of the slave trade on the West Coast of Africa. His last employment was the command of the Adventure on the China station from 1868 until 1871.

Captain Carr Ellison, who died a few days ago, owned large estates in Durham and Northumberland, and he was the representative of the ancient Border family of Carr, who at one time owned Ford Castle, near Coldstream, which now belongs to Lord Waterford. His father assumed the name of Ellison in 1871 on succeeding to the large Hebburn estates on Tyneside. Captain Carr Ellison went through the Crimean War, and was presented with a sword of honour in 1856, after his return to England. He afterwards settled down on his estates as a country squire, and he took a prominent and useful part in Northumberland county business for many years. He was a generous landlord, and was very popular in the district in which he lived.

A correspondent at Hyères relates an interesting incident, which, so far as I have seen, has not got into the daily papers. A villa in the centre of the town, occupied by an English lady, was entered during the night by four burglars, one of whom held a pistol to the lady's head while the room was ransacked and all her belongings appropriated; and after muffling the lady's head with a mosquito curtain, the thieves departed with booty to the value of over 15,000 fr. As we have been forcibly reminded during the past week, burglaries are successfully perpetrated in London, in spite of the most elaborate precautions; but people who take villas in the South of France hardly expect outrages of this kind, and may easily be taken unawares. When I am wintering at Hyères, I think I shall stop at one of the excellent hotels in that town. Private villas may sound more attractive in some ways, but hotels are at any rate pretty safe against burglars.

A lady sends me the following advertisement, cut the other day from an Eastbourne paper. It is a good illustration of the sweating which goes on in domestic service, particularly at the expense of those who combine educational and domestic duties. The lady required, it will be seen, although she is to act as a governess, earns less than a nursemaid's wages, and though her hours may be shorter, she gets nothing in the shape of board or lodging. The hours, indeed, seem to be ingeniously arranged to fit in between meal times:—

YOUNG Lady required at once to walk with Girl of ten and Teach her simple Lessons; mornings only, 9.30 to 1 p.m.; references required; salary 5s. weekly.

The following letter represents, I am quite certain, the view of the vast majority of Englishwomen on the riotous demonstrations of the Female Suffragists. On my own behalf I feel bound to say that I have done my best to speak and write in the vein which my correspondent enjoins. If I have failed to express myself with sufficient force and decision I am sorry, but the failure will only inspire me to renewed efforts:—

Dear Sir,—It has always been your custom to protect and help the wronged, to speak out on behalf of those who cannot speak for themselves. May I, therefore, entreat you to speak or write, and that with force and decision, on behalf of a deeply wronged and grossly outraged class? I mean the great majority of women in the United Kingdom who do not want votes, who are quite satisfied with the amount of influence they already exercise, and who burn with shame at being associated, as members of a common sex, with the creatures who behaved yesterday at the gates of the Houses of Parliament more like drunken men than even the worst of female viragos. Do you consider them fitted to help in directing the Home and Foreign policy of a great nation? Do you think them fitted to help to choose representatives whose duty it will be to do so? Why, we must be the laughing-stock of every European nation. Furthermore, you know well that if the whole women of the country were polled the majority against female suffrage would be overwhelming. Will you be the champion of that voiceless majority? Will you forcibly state the views of those whose ardent desire is to dissociate themselves from the members of the shrieking sisterhood, and to escape from the shame and degradation which they bring on the hitherto respected name of woman?—I am, yours faithfully,

A Non-Suffragette.

THE LADIES' BATTLE.

A Lay of Modern London.

I.

Dame Despard, she a suffragette,
  Did swear by Yea and Nay
That she'd herself arrested get.
  And sent to Holloway.
For long had grieved this worthy dame,
  That, try as she might try,
The p'lice, a-twigging of her game
And quite resolved to baulk the same,
  Had always passed her by.
Yea! though she stood their nose before,
And did, in piteous tones, implore
Arrest, the brutes would still ignore,
  And wink the other eye.

II.

Such insolence could not be borne—
So hath the doughty Despard sworn;
  When she the crown would wear
Of martyrdom, these minions vile
Should not be 'llowed her game to spile,
Withholding thus the martyr's tile
  That ought to grace her hair.

III.

She swore, and named a trysting place
Where gathered all the Suffrage race—
  The place styled Caxton Hall—
Here Pankhurst came from Manchester,
And Kenny from—I can't say where,
And Moffat from the Brig of Ayr
  ('Tis thus her home I call
To serve my rhyme's compelling need;
For where the lady lives, indeed,
Save that it's far beyond the Tweed,
  I do not know at all).

IV.

They come, and many a one beside,
They stream, this petticoated tide,
  From Caxton's fane, in fours,
To Westminster's historic Hall,
Where some they wheedle, some they bawl,
While some with tooth and nail they fall
Upon the peelers, grim and tall,
  Who guard the sacred doors.

V.

The doughty Despard led their van;
She marked, with eagle eye, her man,
  Then into him did barge,
Until that member of The Force
Was driven, though with much remorse,
To manual strength's extreme resource,
  And took the dame in charge.

Next day before the Beak she's brought,
And won the crown she long had sought,
  To deck her tresses grey—
That martyr's crown to which aspire
Such dames—as off, in Black Maria,
  She drove to Holloway.

A number of daily papers have published a cock-and-bull story about the "discovery" of an alleged early portrait of Shakespeare at the village inn at Winston, near Darlington, which picture is stated to have been valued by Christie and Manson at "about five thousand guineas." The whole tale is a farrago of rubbish. The picture in question, which was exhibited some years ago in the Shakespeare Museum at Stratford-on-Avon, is perfectly well known, but experts have never regarded it as genuine. The picture has always been known as "the Grafton Shakespeare," as it is supposed to have originally belonged to the Duke of Grafton, and its ownership can be traced to a farmer on the Grafton estate in Northamptonshire. It is dated 1588.

I found on my table the other day a couple of volumes of an unusual kind—a new issue of Thomson's English translation of the Septuagint, edited by Mr. F. S. Pells, of Hove, who publishes the book himself. In these days, when Biblical criticism is addressed to the very man in the street, the earliest extant translation of the Hebrew scriptures into another tongue ought to command a considerable public; and I must say that it is easy to find in Mr. Pells' edition a good deal of new light on many obscure passages of the authorised version, besides sundry obvious variations of the text which are interesting and suggestive.

Charles Thomson, the author of this translation, was the first Secretary of the United States Congress, a position which he held for seventeen years. He was a man of note in his day, and highly respected by his contemporaries, George Washington among the rest. But he seems to have been a self-educated man, and it is hardly to be supposed that he was a profound classical scholar. Caution, therefore, seems desirable in accepting his reading of the Greek text as if it were "verbally inspired," if anything in the shape of doctrine is to be founded upon it. Mr. Pells holds, and gives his reasons in an interesting preface, that the Septuagint was "the Bible used by our Saviour and the Apostles"—a point on which I should be sorry to express an opinion, though it seems to me one which requires a good deal of proving. He is anxious to see the book restored to a position of authority, and one may agree with him to the extent that an authoritative English translation is desirable. I suppose there is good ground for accepting the Septuagint as representing the oldest extant text of the books it contains, which is enough in itself to give it a peculiar value.

The acute reader will need no assistance from me in identifying the author of the following pathetic appeal:—

> Just recovered from a five weeks' illness, ready and eager to resume my work. I trust you will forgive me if I seem somewhat impatient. But I did think that ere this I should have had some response from you in regard to the Final Fund, on which I wrote to you fully a week ago, especially as that Fund has been started under such very good auspices, and as I made it very clear that the Fund could not be successful unless each one appealed to did something.
> The apathy of the upper and middle classes, the propertied classes, the ought-to-be-influential classes, makes work against Socialism difficult and unpopular, thankless, and costly. . . . I am weary—very weary—of making appeals to rich property owners and capitalists, not because the appeals are not warranted, or proper in themselves, but because such men ought to be forward to help one's work without appeal. . . . . .

The name of the Final Fund is certainly calculated to allure the apathetic propertied classes if any document with the signature "George Brooks" could have that effect. But, unfortunately, the propertied classes know only too well that there is no such thing as finality with the habitual mendicant—except in name. If you will only spare a trifle this time, it is always the last time you will be asked. But another time arrives without fail, and, like G. B. himself, the capitalists grow "weary—very weary." So do I.

Seeger's Hair Dye.—Dyes the hair by merely combing through. 2s. the Case, or Trial Bottle, mailed free from observation, 7d.—Hinde's Ltd., 1A, Finsbury, London.

Though Mr. Brooks does not understand the reason for the apathy of capitalists, it seems clear enough to me. They have to choose between Socialism and George Brooks, and they prefer Socialism. The danger at your door is always more convincing than one only dimly visible in the future. One can even understand that Socialism is chiefly terrible to them as the stalking-horse of George Brooks. The "elect few" who have been placed on Brooks's list for an appeal every quarter-day may well say to themselves, "Why, Socialism could not be so bad as this; let us have Socialism, and get rid of Brooks!" Besides, what is the value of Brooks as a defence against Socialism? Does not he tell us in every appeal, that the peril is to-day more deadly and imminent than ever? Has not he been saying the same thing for ten or twelve years? Judging by his own account, things have only gone from bad to worse since he has been at his "work." It looks as if he were doing more harm than good. I wonder that this view of the matter does not occur to Sir William Lewis, Lord Burton, and the other capitalists who are still writing their cheques.

The passage in the "Final Fund" appeal which most interests me personally is the following:—

When I think of my former comfortable circumstances, and then of my present difficulty and need, county court summonses and judgments—of rent and accounts unpaid—of straitened economies at home, etc., I could wish myself well out of it all; but when I ponder over the alarming growth of Socialism and the perils with which our beloved country is threatened by it, and on the lamentable apathy and weakness which prevail all round, I feel like throwing all prudence to the winds and saying: "Come poverty, privation, and persecution, come workhouse and gaol; I am going to exhaust my energy and life in opposing this dragon which is striving to strike its fangs into my country's heart, and poison and corrupt the very springs of its life."

When Mr. Brooks thinks of his former comfortable circumstances, I suppose his mind runs back to the Halesworth days, and the evidence of his prosperity that was given in his libel action against Truth. But his memory does not seem to have recalled the fact that even in those comfortable days he gave precisely the same account of his "present difficulty and need" that he gives to-day. If in the subsequent ten years his difficulty and need have become more pressing, I take it that it is only because the tale has got worn out. But I really think he need not be so unkind to the "dragon" which—poor beast!—has now provided St. George with the means of subsistence for so many years. "Come workhouse, come gaol" by all means. But if it had not been for Socialism they would have come long before this.

LUCY—UP-TO-DATE.

No. II.

The Fates sweet Lucy in my way
  Once at a Ball did shove.
"She's passing rich," I heard them say—
  I heard, and fell in love.

We wed. She took a bossy tone;
  Eclipsed entire was I,
Like a pale star, when Madame Moon
  Shines regnant in the sky.

She died. I put on looks of woe,
  For other men to see;
But, in my heart, I smiled; for oh!
  Her cheque-book's come to me.

Dr. C. S. Kenny, of Downing College, has been elected to the Downing Chair of the Laws of England, vacant by the much-regretted death of Professor Maitland, whom he succeeded in 1888 as Reader of English Law. The appointment had been fully expected, and it meets with general approval in the University. Dr. Kenny, who is a strong Liberal, sat in the House of Commons as Member for the Barnsley Division of Yorkshire in the Parliaments of 1885 and 1886. He is a profound scholar, and has published several books on legal subjects, which have obtained a considerable success. Dr. Kenny has been a Fellow of Downing since 1875, and has taken an active part in the administrative work of the University, as well as in local business. He has sat for many years on the Cambridge Town Council, and he now Vice-chairman of the Cambridgeshire County Council.

The death of the President of Trinity is an immense loss to Oxford, and deprives the University of a familiar and commanding figure. Mr. Pelham had taken a most active and conspicuous part in the tutorial and administrative work of the University for over thirty-six years, and he exercised great influence both in Congregation and in Convocation, and as a prominent member of the Hebdomadal Council. He also served most usefully on numerous committees and boards, and he was closely associated with the management of the Bodleian, and with Somerville College. Roman history was, of course, his great subject. He was ever zealous on the side of research, and in urging the value of the close study of Greek and Roman history and literature. His lectures, when a tutor of Exeter, were always very able, and attracted large numbers of men from all the colleges in Oxford. Mr. Pelham, who was a son of the late Bishop of Norwich, practically spent his whole life at Oxford, and he had been President of Trinity during the last ten years. He married a daughter of the late Sir Edward Buxton, M.P., and their house was distinguished for its generous and delightful hospitality. Mr. Pelham was all his life a very strong Liberal, but he never forced his political opinions upon his friends, nor were they allowed to get in any way mixed up with his University work. He enjoyed frequent trips to Italy, and his principal diversion was golf.

I have received a copy of the Duke of Devonshire's letter on the financial needs of Cambridge University, but as the letter has already appeared in most of the daily papers, I suppose I may assume that most of my readers are familiar with it. The cardinal fact in it is that the University needs in round figures about a million and a half sterling, most of it more or less urgently, for purposes immediately connected with the proper equipment of a University for the complex work that falls upon it in the present day. The magnitude of the sum is almost enough to daunt the would-be benefactor if he is anything less than a multi-millionaire. Yet there is no reason why it should not be raised in the course of a very few years if the effort were made systematically, if the rich men who have the inclination to endow teaching were brought to understand the need, and, above all, if every man who has passed through the University would signify his affection for his Alma Mater, according to his means, in pounds, shillings, and pence. But with all respect, I would point out to the Chancellor and the University authorities that in these days of competition for subscriptions (as for everything else) you do not get a million of money by merely writing a letter to the newspapers. You must organise and "energise" a big movement, seize every man by the button-hole, especially the millionaire, and drag his money out of him.

I suppose Oxford could do with some more money as well as Cambridge, and she is not likely to sit by in silence while the sister University is extracting a million and a half from the pockets of the public. Oxford is the richer University, but both Universities, as distinguished from the Colleges, are wretchedly endowed, considering what a wealthy nation they adorn, and what a wealthy class they chiefly cater for. This state of things is largely due to lack of "pushfulness," and indisposition to move with the times. Rich men who endow educational institutions in these days are not often University men, and are distrustful of University ideals and methods, and University men themselves when they have money to give know little of University needs. If the old Universities kept more in the front of educational progress, made more effort to supply the requirements of the times, and showed that they not only want money but know how to employ it usefully, instead of limiting their energies to turning out so many hundred curates and barristers per annum, the public would very soon give them all they want. This Cambridge seems to appreciate in some measure.

The sudden death of Prebendary Robinson is a great loss to the diocese of Bath and Wells, in which he had been beneficed for half a century. Prebendary Robinson worked hard in many directions, and everywhere with conspicuous ability and zeal. He will be much missed in Somersetshire by both clergy and laity. He was a most eloquent preacher, and had an exceptional capacity for practical business, so that he exercised much influence in the diocese and was continually consulted by the Bishop. Prebendary Robinson was presented to the important vicarage of Chard in 1876 by the late Bishop of Bath and Wells (Lord Arthur Hervey), to whom he rendered valuable assistance when the Diocesan Conference was first started.

The Misses Nutter have presented Canon Corbett, vicar of St. Botolph's, Colchester, to the valuable rectory of Wanstead, which has become vacant by the death of the late incumbent. Canon Corbett has been doing good work in Essex for the last thirty-seven years as a Churchman of the Moderate school. The living of Wanstead is of the net value of about £900 a year, with house. The Misses Nutter have the patronage of this benefice for their lives, after which it is to pass to the Bishop of St. Albans.

A good example of the practice of tempting clergymen to act as commission agents for tradesmen is furnished by the following circular, which has apparently been sent to all the beneficed clergy in Sussex:—

Moore of Brighton, Ltd.,
Henry Moore, Managing Director,
Motor Engineers.

67-68, Preston-street,
and 21, Regency-square, Brighton.

£10 FOR ANY CHARITY YOU LIKE TO NAME.

Sir,—It has occurred to me as you are intimately acquainted with so many people, you probably know someone who intends to buy a new motor car.

If you give the name and address of any such it will be my pleasure to hand the above sum to any charity you like IF I AM SUCCESSFUL IN EFFECTING A SALE.

It is, of course, possible that more than one clergyman will send the same name. Should this occur, the said £10 will be given by me to the one from whom I received the first intimation, and £5 additional will be given to the second.

Immediately I hear I shall reply stating whether or no previous information has been given me, and as evidence of good faith I shall add the name of the clergyman or clergymen who have previously written.

I am sending one letter by the same post to every rector and vicar in Sussex.

I have only to add it is a matter of indifference to me which make of car is selected. I am quite willing to supply, with one or two exceptions, any make desired.—Yours truly,

Henry Moore.

One vicar who received this communication observes that though he is not quite clear whether the promised £10 would be a "secret commission" within the meaning of the new Act, he is "quite clear that it is a secret commission within the meaning of those who wanted the Act passed"; and this seems to be the proper view of the matter. The circular, however, is also of interest to motorists. Mr. Moore, who is ready to supply any make of car, is actually prepared to pay a £10 commission out of his profits, regardless of the price of the car, to any one who will get him an order. There must be a pretty handsome middemen's profit to enable him to do this; and it is easy to see what effect the multiplication of commissions, secret or otherwise, on this scale must have on prices.

The East Anglian Times describes an edifying scene which took place the previous Sunday in the parish church of Felixstowe. Before the sermon at the morning service "two frightened little boys, aged about nine and ten," were brought to the chancel steps in the presence of the congregation, and interrogated by the Vicar, the Rev. S. R. Gamble, as to whether they abjured the errors of the Church of Rome and desired to be received into the Church of England. The infant converts solemnly replied that they did, and returned to their places, and the Vicar proceeded to discourse upon the glorious event. The Pope of Rome must have had a bad quarter of an hour when he heard of this triumph of Protestantism.

A Roman Catholic correspondent writes:—

The paragraph suggesting churchwardens for Catholic churches in your issue of the 30th ult. escaped my notice until yesterday.

Far from there being any inclination on the part of the authorities to accept the assistance of the laity in this way, such parish committees as have existed for some time are being systematically suppressed—at any rate, in the diocese of Westminster. The policy of the present Archbishop in this matter is thoroughly retrograde, and naturally sets the key for his clergy. It is through this policy that the Temporal Council established by his predecessors and to whose labours in cordial co-operation with them the building of the Cathedral was so largely due, was immediately dissolved on the elevation of the present Archbishop. This was done, to the keen disappointment not only of the members of the Council, but of the large majority of the more independent and thoughtful portion of the laity, who saw in the Council a faint recognition of the principle that the laity are not to be regarded merely as a mass of blind and dumb contributors.

At the same time, though the desire for parish committees is very widely felt, the laity have no desire for committees composed merely of the limp nominees of the parish priest. They would even prefer the present absence of system, as they can always turn a deaf ear to appeals from the altar for objects they do not sympathise with, whereas it may be otherwise when committeemen make a direct personal application.

Your correspondents are unfortunate in their selection of examples of successful parish committees. It has been brought accidentally to my notice that at least one of these had piled up a debt of at least £8,000, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the parishioners when the debt stood at £6,000. The rector in this case is able to carry things with such a high hand, in spite of his committee, that he has not scrupled to set aside the ancient customs of the Church at High Mass, and has adopted a French eighteenth century cérémoniale. . . . . The funny thing about this affair is that the cérémoniale has been introduced to gratify the tastes of certain ex-Protestant ritualists, for whom even the Roman Catholic Church is not yet "high" enough. Of course, if the committee in this case were any good, they could, by a direct remonstrance or complaint to the ordinary, put a stop to all these extravagances, as well as to the St. Antony's boxes and other inventions of La Croix, which stink in the nostrils of old Catholics. . . .

With regard to the general question of administration, while there is no doubt that the laity in England, and to a considerable extent in Ireland also, are disturbed by a sense that things are not as they ought to be, they are hoping, with some confidence, that the good sense of those in authority will initiate the needful reforms, instead of waiting until they are wrung from them by force of circumstances.

Is this the latest evidence of the far-reaching effects of the Secret Commissions Act? I quote from a document entitled, "Rules for the Management of Yarrow Churchyard":—

2. A minimum fee of ten shillings shall be charged for digging each grave, but the Sexton may accept more than this sum, should the person ordering the grave offer him more.

So if the customer wants an inch or two more elbow room, or a trifle of extra depth below the surface, the sexton is free to take an extra half-crown or half-sovereign for humouring his taste, without either party having anything to fear on the score of bribery and corruption.

Mr. Registrar Hope, a few days ago, refused the application of the Rev. William Earle for his discharge from bankruptcy, and suspended his discharge for three years from May last, the date of his public examination. Many of my readers will doubtless remember the name of this reverend gentleman, who has been before the public on more than one occasion, and came under the notice of Truth just twelve months ago. He calls himself Sir William Earle, on the strength of some nebulous claim to one of King James I.'s original baronetcies. He has been in the Bankruptcy Court for the last twelve months; and the reason for the suspension of his discharge was the insufficiency of his assets and "rash and hazardous speculation." The facts were that the proofs against his estate amounted to £2,402, while his assets consisted solely of equities of redemption which he himself valued at £7,380, but which turned out to be absolutely worthless.

When I had occasion to comment upon Mr. Earle's proceedings in February last, he was engaged in hawking the shares of a small private commercial company through the medium of an office described as "the Church and State Exchange," of which he called himself president; but apart from himself the said Exchange appeared to have no existence. He called upon me, and offered various explanations, all of which were more or less contradicted by other parties concerned in the transactions. He made, however, an earnest appeal to me not to say anything further on the subject, on the ground that he had an expectation of obtaining one of the most valuable livings in London, which happened to be vacant at that moment. It was perfectly obvious that he had no more prospect of obtaining the living in question than I have of being appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. But as he renounced all intention of pursuing his "share-pushing" operations, I did not think it necessary to say more about him at the moment, and he was made bankrupt immediately afterwards. The result of the bankruptcy proceedings, however, shows that my observations about him were fully justified, and as Mr. Earle is one of those gentlemen who are apt to obtain credit on the strength of their position and pretensions, I think it right to call attention to the Registrar's decision in his case.

SUNDAY BEST.

The Mayor of Nottingham, I see,
Is very much distressed
About the immorality
Of donning "Sunday Best."

For persons wearing raiment smart
(So says the worthy Mayor),
Are seldom found to join, with heart,
In worship, praise, or prayer;

But, heedless of the words sublime
Read from the Holy Book,
Instead, they're thinking all the time
How very nice they look.

Thus, Jones, the latest thing who wears
In trouserings slap-bang,
Keeps glancing down with side-long stares
To notice how they hang.

While Mrs. J., though warm the day
Pretends it's cold enough
Her priceless sables to display,
Or grey chinchilla muff.

Or, even if she self forgets
'Tis but (let truth be spoke)
To size up Mrs. Brown's corsets,
Or Mrs. Thomson's toque;

Or p'raps to wonder how Miss Kate,
The elderly and fat,
Can dare to wear, at fifty-eight,
A saucy sailor hat.

The Mayor, he thinks this very sad
And ought to be repressed.
But just suppose a law we had Forbidding Sunday Best!

If women, when to Church they went,
Their smart frocks mighn't air,
Nor criticise, with gaze intent,
What other women wear,

This even worse result, I ween,
Would certainly befall—
They'd simply cut the sacred scene
Nor go to Church at all!

I had an inquiry the other day respecting an appeal for money for the Workmen's Hall, Drury-lane, of which a Mr. Henry Hambleton is the secretary, and, as far as I can see, the proprietor. The institution in question has been in existence for a very great number of years. It is carried on by Mr. Hambleton single-handed, without any responsible committee, and consequently nothing can be known of its finances or general management except what Mr. Hambleton himself chooses to tell. His principal work seems to be to circulate a publication called the Workmen's Messenger. It may be a very interesting journal to some people, but from what I know of working men, I should say that there is uncommonly little in it which is specially interesting or useful to them. The rest of his work seems to consist chiefly of such familiar business as Bible Services, Band of Hope, summer outings, etc.

Mr. Hambleton issues annually a list of subscriptions received, and a "general summary" of the year's finances; and from the last of these documents it appears that he received during the year, from one source and another, £489 odd, of which £245 was absorbed by the production of the Workmen's Messenger, £76 odd by rent, taxes, gas, etc., and £59 odd by "relief, teas, Christmas dinners, etc."; £20 10s. was spent on an "excursion," and at the end of the account appears the singular entry "Towards labour, £58 8s. 6d." Apparently this sum balances the account, for no balance was in hand at the end of the year, and none was brought forward from the previous year, so that it looks as if all the cash not otherwise accounted for is put "towards labour, etc." I presume that the labour it goes towards is that of Mr. Hambleton himself. Whether the labourer is worthy of his hire depends chiefly on the view that the subscribers take of the value of the Bible classes, country excursions, and indiscriminate charity in the shape of free meals. The only opinion which I can express is that the Workmen's Messenger is certainly not worth the collection of £245 per annum from charitable sources, and that everyone engaged in this sort of work ought to have a responsible committee behind him, and to issue accounts vouched for by some one else than himself.

The appeal which Lord Northampton is making for a public testimonial to Mr. John Kirk ought to meet with a general and hearty response. Mr. Kirk has been identified with the Ragged School Union for over a quarter of a century, during which time he has multiplied its utility tenfold, besides giving valuable work to many other useful agencies of the same class; and every one who has been in contact with him can endorse Lord Northampton's eulogy of his energy and devotion to duty. What particularly entitles Mr. Kirk to the grateful recognition of the public is the contrast beween his work and that of so many other labourers in the same field, for no branch of philanthropy is more beset by fraud and humbug than work among the children of the poor.

I have to acknowledge 10s. from "Une poupée" towards the Toy Fund.

It is astonishing to see how persistently the firms who lay themselves out to supply goods to soldiers and sailors on credit use the naval and military authorities as debt-collecting agencies. This trick has usually been illustrated in connection with the notorious business of Graves, of Sheffield. Here is another instance of it from another advertising firm of very similar class, J. N. Masters, of Rye. The communication is addressed to a regimental sergeant-major (no name given) at Aldershot, and headed "Strictly confidential":—

Sir,—We trust we are not taking too great a liberty in addressing you in this matter, but should esteem it a great favour if you would inform us if you have now in the — — a Corporal — —.

Would you also kindly have the enclosed letter handed to — —, late of R.W. Fusiliers. You will be sure that we will not prove ungrateful for your kind information.

We enclose stamped addressed envelope, and thank you in anticipation of an early reply as to when delivered.—Yours faithfully, J. N. Masters, Ltd.

Although in this particular instance the communication was considered "too great a liberty," that it is not always considered so is shown by the persistence of these practices. Presumably the explanation is to be found in the significant sentence which indicates that J. N. Masters, Ltd., "will not be ungrateful" for any assistance that the sergeant-major can give them in the direction required; and as it is so clear that men in authority in the Service are ready to earn the favours of credit firms in this way, I suggest again that some steps should be taken by superior authority to check such abuses.

The mention of the name of Graves reminds me of a communication I had the other day from an Irish solicitor. This gentleman states that at the last Quarter Sessions at Navan and Trim, County Meath, upwards of thirty civil bills at the suit of J. G. Graves, Ltd., were entered for hearing. Evidently, this mischievous trade has been extended of late to Ireland on a large scale, and my informant mentions that, as usual, the defendants were nearly all persons in very humble circumstances, mostly farm servants and day labourers. The county court business is done on the cheap, like the rest of the trade, no representative of the firm being sent to the court to prove the debts, and the plaintiffs relying on the attendance of the defendants on subpœna for the necessary evidence. It is some consolation to know that this method of procedure did not prove effectual, only one or two of the defendants attending, and all the rest of the cases being struck out in consequence. The Irish are a quick-witted race, with a native instinct for the niceties of legal practice, and Graves is not the first English creditor who has discovered this.

By the way, I heard the other day, without sorrow, that Graves, Limited, has lately been in some financial difficulty, and has had to make certain arrangements with a view to "gaining time." There is something of poetic justice about this, and I only hope that in its dealings with its own creditors the firm will be done by as it has done. Under the circumstances, I would not recommend the pushing of the business in Ireland, at any rate.

Stammering cured only by personal tuition; interview on written application—Mr. A. C. Schnelle, 119, Bedford Court-mansions, London, W.C. Pupils taken in residence.

Apropos of the Indian Family Pension Fund, an officer tells me that a few years ago several officers invited signatures to a very moderate and respectfully worded petition to the Government on the subject of this fund. On learning what was going on, the authorities issued a confidential memorandum calling attention to a certain paragraph in the Army Act, and informing officers that any such concerted action was equivalent to mutiny, and would be dealt with accordingly. This is a most outrageous proceeding, and it is a pity that attention was not called to it at the time. It shows the mischief that may arise from a fund of this character being conducted under official management, and if the fund is to be reformed in any way, as I hope it may be, one point that ought to be considered is that the contributories to the fund should have a right to an opinion as to its management, and the right of addressing the Government on the subject without fear of being treated as mutineers.

A point worth notice on the question of soldiers' characters is made by an ex-soldier, who sends me a long account of his difficulties in obtaining employment. His suggestion is that the character given to a man on his discharge should be determined by his company officer and not by the officer commanding the regiment, the argument for this being that the company officer knows the man much better than the C.O., and is in far better position to judge the precise significance of any entries to his disadvantage in his defaulter sheets. The man in question is one of those who have suffered, as so many do, by being discharged with the useless character "good," owing to one or two entries, which he attributes to the personal malice of non-commissioned officers. After a long and fruitless search for employment, he eventually got a job on the strength of an excellent private testimonial given to him by his company officer, having at length found an employer who considered this testimonial of more value than the official character given by the C.O. Any employer who understood the circumstances would attach much more value to a testimonial from a company officer than from a commanding officer; and common sense seems to suggest that if the former does not actually determine the character that is to be given he should at any rate have a voice in the matter.

A good deal of resentment appears to have been caused in a certain field battery in India owing to some of the men having been placed under the orders of a havildar of a native regiment, while doing some fatigue work in a practice camp. As this resentment has been confided to me, accompanied by many strong observations respecting the indignity of an English soldier being ordered about by a "native," I feel bound to point out that the English soldier and the native soldier equally wear the King's uniform, exercise the King's authority, and are expected to fight side by side the battles of their King and country without squabbling over the colour of one another's skins. I would therefore suggest to the indignant gunners that they should remember that when they receive orders from superior officers, it is the rank that they are expected to respect, not the individual who bears it. At the same time, human nature being what it is, and persons with white skins considering themselves such superior beings to those whose skins are of a darker hue, it certainly seems undesirable that native non-commissioned officers should be set over British soldiers if it can possibly be avoided.

It would be highly interesting to know where the Press Association caught the canard about Lord Charles Beresford's refusal of the command of the Channel Fleet. That the wish was father to the thought there can be no doubt, nor that the party, or parties, who communicated the valuable information to the world are associated with the organised campaign against Sir John Fisher which was discussed in Truth the other day. It shows, therefore, that these patriots do not stick at much. No doubt they believed what they revealed, but their eagerness to use an officer in Lord Charles Beresford's position as a whipping-boy for the Lords of the Admiralty is decidedly indecent, and does not indicate a very sagacious regard for the best interests of the Service. Lord Charles Beresford himself will probably be the last to approve of the part which he was cast for.

In the ordinary course of things the Navy Estimates must now be in preparation, and as economy is the order of the day, I would suggest to "my Lords" that the cost of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, is a matter calling for consideration. According to my information, there have been for some time past less than 100 students in the College, and at present the number is about eighty. The staff, however, remains the same as when the number was over 200. An admiral receiving £2,000 a year, with a large residence, a captain, and a commander are considered necessary for the discipline of these eighty students. The domestic staff of servants, porters, messengers, etc., numbers something like 100, or over one for every student in the College. A very heavy expenditure is being incurred at present on the re-roofing of the College. This may or may not be necessary, but a further expenditure of £500 or £600 on a dancing floor cannot possibly be. I do not profess to have this information at first hand, but if it is anywhere near the truth, there seems an opening here for something substantial in the way of "retrenchment."

I learn from Simla that the remarkable deadlock in connection with the local municipality which I described nearly eighteen months ago still continues. It arose through one of the elected European members having had the temerity to criticise the work of the engineer-secretary of the municipality. That an elected member, a mere representative of the ratepayers, should dare to take exception to anything done by a paid servant of the municipality was regarded by the Punjab Government as an outrage calling for drastic correction. The Punjab Municipal Act empowers the Government, in certain circumstances, to refuse to confirm elections to the municipality, such confirmation being required before an elected member can take his seat. In due course the term of office of the above-mentioned critic of officialdom expired. His constituents, comprising all the European and native owners of property in Simla outside the bazaar limits, evinced their approval of his conduct by again electing him, in company with two other candidates. The Government, however, declined to confirm these elections, and since the autumn of 1905 the municipal business of Simla has been managed—the ratepayers say mis-managed—by a body consisting of Government nominees and two elected native representatives of the Bazaar Ward.

The only reason which the Punjab Government vouchsafed for the non-confirmation of the elections was that "the question of the future administration of Simla had been referred to the Government of India." This was in October, 1905, and in reply to a memorial of the Simla House Proprietors' Association a few weeks back, protesting against their continued disfranchisement, the Punjab Government stated that "the matter is still awaiting the decision of the Government of India!" At the best, owing to the strength of the nominated official element in the municipality, the ratepayers of Simla have never been able to exercise any really effective control over the management of their affairs; and it is a flagrant scandal that they should thus be arbitrarily and indefinitely deprived even of the small share of local self-government which the Punjab Municipal Act gave them.

Red tape seems to flourish in India more vigorously than in any other part of his Majesty's dominions. One of my readers who resides in Ceylon relates a grievance illustrating this point. He had occasion to make a two days' visit to Bombay, and took with him a native servant. Before he returned, he made inquiries as to whether his servant, being a third class passenger, would need to be submitted to medical examination and disinfection, but he could learn nothing on the point until he actually went on board, when he found that his servant was detained on the wharf by the port medical officer. This functionary, on being interviewed, insisted that the servant must be disinfected, although the steamer was to start in a few minutes. He suggested that the captain should delay the ship half an hour for this purpose, and the captain not falling in with this suggestion, the difficulty was only got over by paying the servant's fare as a second class passenger. This having been done, the ship, the servant, and the master were allowed to depart without further objection. It would be interesting to know what scientific basis the medical authorities have for assuming that infection is less easily conveyed by a second than by a third class passenger, or that a second class ticket is a better disinfectant than a third class one.

I have received a letter from Mr. R. Nanasamy Rao, private secretary to the Dewan of Mysore, in reference to a paragraph which appeared in Truth on the subject of the Mysore Mines Regulation. The paragraph stated that this law, promulgated by the Government of his Highness the Maharaja at the instance of the Government of India, was not confined to the neighbourhood of the gold mines, but extended to the whole State. I find that this was a mistake so far as the more drastic sections of the enactment are concerned. A Government notification is required to apply the sections in question to any local area, and the only area that has been so dealt with is one of about 250 square miles in the immediate vicinity of the Kolar gold fields—a very small tract of the entire Mysore State, and containing but one-fiftieth of the total population.

With regard to a remark that this enactment was of an extraordinary character, the private secretary to the Dewan of Mysore writes:—

> It is so in the sense that it is intended to meet exceptional conditions prevalent in a local area of small extent, in which valuable gold mining operations are carried on and which is occupied for the most part by a floating population either directly connected with the mines or lured thither by motives of dishonest gain. The great increase in gold theft cases in recent years has been a serious evil and required stringent measures for its extirpation. Even more drastic provisions are to be found in the gold mining laws of the self-governing British colonies of Victoria, West Australia, and South Africa.

The latter reminder is a palpable hit, and in so far as my paragraph implied any censure upon the Government of the native State of Mysore, I withdraw it.

A voluminous correspondence has been sent to me in reference to the case of an old ex-postman named Ridley, of Chester-le-Street. He was employed as a rural postman from 1864 till 1873, when he resigned. In 1874 he started again as a town postman, and he continued in that situation till 1903, when he was compulsorily retired on account of his age. Altogether he put in about thirty-eight years' service as a postman, and when he was retired he had five good-conduct stripes. It might be supposed that the State, which we have been told acts as a model employer, would grant this old servant a pension, or at least a gratuity. Neither has been granted to Ridley. Owing to the break in 1873-1874, the first nine years of his service are excluded from consideration for this purpose. As to the other twenty-nine years, it seems that when this period began he was too old by three months for appointment as an "established" postman. This deprived him of any legal right to a pension. As to a gratuity, it appears that from 1874 till 1889 his wages were paid under an allowance to the local postmaster, and "service paid for in this manner is not reckoned by the Treasury for any award under the Superannuation Acts." A compassionate gratuity is only awarded on a minimum of fifteen years' direct employment by the Post Office, and Ridley's further period of service from 1889 to 1903 was therefore not sufficient by one year to render him eligible for such a gratuity.

Friends of the old man have made strenuous efforts to secure him some assistance from the State. One or two M.P.s have represented the hardship of his case to the Postmaster-General, and after a great deal of effort the magnificent sum of £5 was granted to Ridley from the Rowland Hill Benevolent Fund. So far as the State itself is concerned, however, nothing whatever has been done. This "model employer," finding that the man was too old—he is now over 70—to be of further use, cast him aside, and whether he dies in a workhouse or starves to death outside seems to be a matter of indifference to the powers that be. It cannot be pretended that he ought to have provided for his old age himself, seeing that the wage that he received was never more than 22s. a week. Regarded legally, the official treatment of this humble veteran may be correct. Morally, however, it is indefensible and a disgrace to this wealthy country.

The Daily Telegraph had an article the other day on "the prospective disappearance" of the "walk clerk," in consequence of the new arrangement of the banks for dealing through the clearing-house with cheques drawn on branches. The change was represented as likely to be to the advantage of shareholders, as no doubt it will be, but the writer drew extensively on his imagination in speaking of "the young gentlemen who now move about town so gaily," and "run up little bills of expenses." From one of these young gentlemen, who sends me his views about the Daily Telegraph scribe, I gather that there is precious little gaiety about the walk clerk's vocation, and that the "little bills of expenses" are a figment of the D. T. imagination, unless regarded as bills which the clerk himself has to pay.

According to my informant, the average allowance of a walk clerk per diem is 4d. for 'bus fares. Except for the occasional lift which he can get for this sum, he may have to tramp, making frequent calls, from Lombard-street to Charing Cross viâ Oxford-street and Regent-street, and back by the Strand. His job will take him four or five hours, and woe betide him if he were seen entering any house of refreshment while it is in progress. The wear and tear of shoe-leather and clothing—for he must be decently dressed, whatever the weather—is debited to his account, not the bank's. And he performs his journey under the constant risk of being robbed. Probably no clerk will regret being relieved of this job; but beyond that, all that the change means to the bank staffs is that there will be some reduction in their number.

One of the ugliest revelations in connection with the proceedings against the West Ham Guardians is contained in the evidence of the manager of the local branch of the London and Provincial Bank. In order to obtain the Guardians' account, which apparently was hardly to be desired for its own sake, this gentleman distributed among Guardians and officials sums which he estimates "in round figures" at £100. He seems to have paid it reluctantly, at any rate when he began, but presumably he believed that if he did not pay a rival manager would. He explained that all his expenditure was reimbursed by the bank. This implies that the proceeding was approved and ratified at headquarters. Are we really to take it that leading joint stock banks, in competing for accounts of public bodies, regard the bribing of public representatives and officials as legitimate business?

An admirer of Skegness, especially of its salubrious air and excellent golf-course, sends me some humorous comments on the facts noticed in a recent paragraph that the town has no police court and no resident magistrates, and that nearly all the local officials, such as the chairman, the clerk, and the treasurer of the District Council, the poor-law relieving officer, and the registrars of births and deaths live elsewhere. He explains that, though these functionaries do not, for various reasons, reside in Skegness, they show their appreciation of the health-giving qualities of the place by putting in a good deal of time there. Neither a relieving officer nor a registrar of deaths is wanted on the spot, because there are few or no paupers and people never or hardly ever die there. As to births, why the babies thrive so rapidly that they can very soon trot over to the office at Burgh and register their own births! Joking apart, however, my correspondent admits that even in this Elysium of the East Coast the absence of a police court and resident magistrates is a public inconvenience that ought to be remedied.

I have received the following letter, and I am in doubt as to how far its publication may have the prejudicial effect which the writer is anxious about. But I think it deserves publication as a document of general interest in connection with the relation of the press to legal proceedings. Mr. Sanders' clients know a great deal more about my business than I do myself, for this is the first I have heard of the article about which they are so fully informed. But it is evident that they believe me to be in possession of information which they are anxious to prevent my publishing, and I bow to their superior knowledge and judgment:—

1, Old Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, London,
February 16, 1907.

Dear Sir,—I am writing on behalf of Messrs. Vert and Sinkins, Concert-Direction Limited, and Mr. Lawrence Cowen.

My clients have been informed that an article is in course of preparation to appear in Truth which contains reflections upon both my clients and their relations with one another.

I have to inform you that legal proceedings for slander and libel have been commenced by my clients against Mr. Pedro Tillett (trading as N. Vert) and against others, and these actions will raise various points which are involved in your article, according to my clients' information concerning it. It is therefore my duty to warn you that the publication of the article in question, or of any similar article, is likely to be prejudicial to proceedings which are now sub judice, and to request you accordingly to refrain from such publication.—Yours faithfully, W. H. Sanders.

Several Scotch correspondents have informed me that the words of the oath administered in the Scotch Courts were not given quite correctly in my paragraph on the subject last week. Curiously enough my correspondents themselves are not in complete agreement as to the precise words, but the usual form appears to be: "I swear by Almighty God, as I shall answer to God at the Great Day of Judgment, that I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It is said, however, that this form is often cut down—especially in the inferior courts—to the simple words: "I swear that I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." As to the manner in which the oath is administered, not only the witness, but also the judge (both standing), holds up his right hand, and the witness repeats the words after the judge. This is undoubtedly much more impressive than the English procedure, and as the Scotch oath is now being increasingly used here, it is desirable that official instructions in regard to its proper form should be issued to judges, magistrates, coroners, and other functionaries who are called upon to administer it.

Congenial Employment for officers and gentlemen with £500 to £5,000. Extra Capital found for profit-earning concerns. Major F. E. V. Taylor, The Officers' Employment Bureau, 14a, Belfast Chambers, Beak-st., Regent-st., W.

At Bristol, last week, Louis Fine was convicted under the Moneylenders Act of having unlawfully carried on business as a moneylender elsewhere than at his registered address, and the magistrates inflicted a penalty of £20 and costs. The fact that Fine was committing this offence was discovered by one of my staff during an inspection of the register at Somerset House, and the prosecution was the outcome of a paragraph in Truth directing the attention of the Chief Constable of Bristol to the matter. The Chief Constable is to be congratulated upon this enforcement of the Act, and I commend his example to the authorities at Scotland Yard. In London, as I have repeatedly shown, the police appear to treat violations of the penal clauses of the Moneylenders Act as outside the range of their duties, and far more flagrant offences than Fine's are committed with impunity.

An old man of sixty-nine years of age named William Peters, who was brought up at Birmingham Quarter Sessions last week for stealing some waistcoats, supplies an appalling example of the manufacture of the recidivist criminal by our fatuous penal system. According to the Recorder he has served in all fifty-three years' penal servitude, and since he was a boy of sixteen he has only spent ten months of his life outside prison walls. What was the original offence which led to the lad's first incarceration and started him on his remarkable prison career, Mr. Dugdale omitted to mention. It is a pity he did not do so, for the facts would be of value to reformative penologists. But even without full details of Peter's career it is impossible not to see in him a victim of the old time judicial ferocity which sought the punishment rather than the reform of the criminal.

I have received from Messrs. Alpe and Ward, solicitors, a letter which I print below with the omission of one sentence. My paragraph was based upon the remarks of Mr. Justice Joyce in refusing the injunction for which Messrs. Alpe and Ward's client applied. While I am willing to afford publicity to the rest of their statement, the sentence that I have omitted seems to involve something like a pre-judgment of the matter still sub judice, and its insertion might give employment to other solicitors—including, possibly, my own. For this reason I have deleted that particular passage from Messrs. Alpe and Ward's letter, which is otherwise as follows:—

Our client Mr. H. T. Terry's attention has been brought to a paragraph in the edition of Truth, dated the 13th inst., relating to a decision of Mr. Justice Joyce in an action of Terry v. Paddington. The writer of this paragraph is evidently under a misapprehension as to the facts of the case. The prize alleged to have been won by the defendant was in respect of a competition held in the month of February, 1904, which competition did not in any way belong to our client Terry, although at the time he was in the employment of the proprietors. . . . . The matter came before the learned Judge on an interlocutory motion for an injunction, and we are pressing on the action with the utmost vigour.

Our client instructs us that he is in a position and quite willing to prove, that every prize offered by him has been duly paid. This being so, we must ask you, in fairness to him, to insert this letter in your next issue

My Legal Pillory supplies this week a number of glaring contrasts in the treatment accorded offenders against the person and offenders against property. Thus it would appear that in the eye of the law the man who indulges in a little surreptitious skating on public water is as heinous an offender as the ruffian who kicks and batters his fourteen-year-old son; that to set a snare for a rabbit merits twice the punishment doled out to the man who attempts to strangle his sister; that nothing less than three months' imprisonment is adequate punishment for the lad who steals two bagatelle balls, while the knacker who puts an unfortunate horse to inexpressible agony in the attempt to export it alive to the Continent, is considered to be sufficiently penalised by the infliction of a fine.

Sheffield Police-court. Before Alderman Senior and Mr. F. Brittain. George West, charged with assaulting his son, aged 14. The boy was kicked and struck on the head with a mug, stunning him, and making a wound penetrating to the bone. Fined 20s.

Birmingham Police-court. Before the Stipendiary and other magistrates. Samuel Holloway, charged with assaulting his sister. He broke into her house, dragged her about by the hair, tried to strangle her, and bombarded her with dishes. Fined 20s. and costs.

Grimsby Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. Henry Grantham, a knacker exporter, and George Dennis, drover, charged with cruelty to a horse. The animal could not walk without excruciating pain, and after taking three days to travel eight miles it collapsed. Grantham fined £2 2s. 6d. inclusive, Dennis 10s.

Romford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. A. Wright and J. D. Broodbank. George and Alfred Otley, charged with assaulting J. J. Bennett. He was attacked by both defendants, knocked down, and kicked. Fined 40s. and costs each.

Woodbridge Petty Sessions. Before Mr. W. W. Hunt and other magistrates. Harriet Bird, single woman, charged with neglecting her three children. The children were half starved and were in a filthy condition. Bound over in £5 to come up for judgment.

Abingdon Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. Coxeter, Brewer, and Paul. Thomas Hodnett, charged with cruelty to a mare by keeping it without food and water during the cold weather. From January 19 to January 30 only three "pitches" of barley straw were given the animal to eat. Fined £3 and costs.

Wragby Police-court. Before Messrs. N. L. Calcraft, J. Sharpe, and the Hon. George Heneage. J. Hosthorpe, charged with assaulting Arthur White. White was knocked down and bitten through the ear and on the arm. Fined £1 and costs.

Llandaff Police-court. Before Dr. Taylor and other magistrates. P. Rogers and W. Clark, charged with being on enclosed premises during prohibited hours. They were skating on Roath Park lake after the time appointed for the closing of the park. Fined 20s. and costs each.

Somerton Petty Sessions. Before Colonel F. W. Pinney, Messrs. E. W. Valentine, A. E. Staley, Russell Barrington, R. Alford, F. M. Eastment, and H. C. Price. Charles Garland, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. He set some snares for rabbits. Fined 40s. and costs.

Pontypridd Police-court. Before the Stipendiary. John Bowden, a youth, charged with stealing two bagatelle balls. Three months' imprisonment.

Worksop Police-court. John Rose, W. Bartrop, and R. Elms, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Rose fined 40s. and costs, and the others 30s. each.

Droxford Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. W. H. Myers, R. A. P. B. Campbell-Wyndham, H. W. Trinder, E. Whalley Tasker, and Major Randolph. W. Matthews, a gipsy, charged with stealing two faggots of wood, value 4d. Three weeks' hard labour.

Ixworth Petty Sessions. Before Major-General H. Percival, Mr. C. S. Wolton, and Mr. H. J. Parker Jolly. James Dew and George Smith, charged with night poaching. Smith six weeks' hard labour; Dew fined £1 and costs.

Andover Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor. Thomas Sanders and Robert Johnson, tramps, charged with making false statements. They told the police at Stockbridge that they had come from Sarum, whereas they had only come from Andover, after receiving relief. Seven days' hard labour each.

Boston Borough Police-court. Before Dr. A. Tuxford, Messrs. Bedford, J. Beaulah, H. B. Clark, J. W. Skinner, J. H. Simpson, and J. Thompson. Arthur Prudence, charged with stealing a pair of scissors, of the value of 1s. One month's hard labour.

Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Nearly 8,000 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private," absolutely confidential.—Secretary, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

John Brady, farmer, and G. Barnaby, farm servant, charged with working a horse, one of whose feet was completely rotted away. Brady fined 14s. 6d., inclusive; case against Barnaby dismissed.

Alloa Sheriff's Court. Before Sheriff-Substitute Dean Leslie. George Love, charged with stealing a pocketful of potatoes from a potato pit. Thirty days' imprisonment York Police-court. Before Messrs. W. W. Hargrove, H. W. Empson, T. E. Wood, and S. Wright. Nathaniel Smith, charged with cruelty to a pony. The animal, which was ill and in an emaciated condition, was thrashed with a whip until it fell down. Fined 10s. and costs.

I wonder what amount of evidence the Tywardreath Bench would require to prove a case of cruelty? Before these Cornish Shallows last week the R.S.P.C.A. prosecuted a man for cruelty to a pony, which was so overdriven that at the end of the journey it fell down and died from exhaustion. A veterinary surgeon stated that this was the cause of the animal's death, and several witnesses deposed that they saw the defendant driving the pony and trap (in which there were five men) at a furious pace; but the magistrates held that the evidence was insufficient to prove a case of cruelty and dismissed the summons. The letters that I have received show that this decision has excited a good deal of astonishment in the district, and, having read the evidence, I should have been astonished myself had I not long since discovered that the ways of the Great Unpaid are past understanding.

As an illustration of the continuous vitality of some of the bloodsucking fraternity, a correspondent sends me a reminiscence of H. Sanguinetti, alias "H. Lester," whose name figured in my recent Cautionary List. Twenty-nine years ago, when he was at Cambridge, my correspondent was pestered with the circulars of this usurer's tout. He passed the circulars on to his father who submitted them to his college tutor, the Rev. E. H. Morgan, of Jesus College, now the popular Master of the College. The result was that Mr. Morgan preached an excellent sermon on the subject of an undergraduate's temptations, with special reference to the tempter Sanguinetti. In the past thirty years or so I have often taken that shark as a text for a little journalistic homily, but I did not know before that he had achieved the distinction of being denounced in a college sermon.

By the way, I find that I omitted from the Cautionary List the name of another veteran touting moneylender—Arthur Cheston, 18, New Burlington-street. One of his circulars came to hand a few days ago to remind me of his existence. Cheston is not quite such a veteran as Sanguinetti, but, still, it is a great many years now since, after learning the tricks of the trade as clerk to the once notorious Harry Marcus, alias Mason, alias Fry, alias Kennedy, he blossomed forth as an extortioner on his own account.

A peculiar, almost pathetic, figure in the world of usury is the needy tout signing himself "Frank Berry." There are other needy touts, but they contrive somehow to keep up outward appearances, to rent an office, to get their circulars printed, and to buy postage stamps. Not so Berry. For many years past he has done his touting from some humble lodging in a back street or from some small newspaper shop serving as an accommodation address. He laboriously writes out his own circulars on the cheapest procurable notepaper, puts them into envelopes endorsed "private," and sealed with a dab of wax, and then drops them into the letter-boxes of well-to-do residents. Just now people in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park are being favoured with his intimation, dated from 112, Oliphant-street, Queen's Park, that from £50 to £10,000 can be quickly advanced to all responsible persons of either sex. It is not easy to imagine any one applying to this impecunious individual for a loan, but still it is evident that he manages now and then to get hold of a would-be borrower from whom a fee or commission can be extracted, or else he would not continue his curious method of business year after year.

A firm of solicitors in the country relate another instance of the rapacity of I. A. Hardy and Co., of Chancery-lane—a debt-collecting firm, who have frequently come under notice in TRUTH on this same ground. It may be remembered that Hardy and Co.'s trick is to charge a trifling commission, and supplement it by outrageous charges for postage. In one of the latest instances they collected a debt for 10s. and remitted to the creditor 4s. 3d., the modest commission of 2s. being swollen by "postages" to the tune of 3s. 9d. In another case they collected £1 12s., on which their commission was 3s. 6d., and postages this time amounted to 5s. The total debt in this case was £4 17s., and after the £1 12s. had been collected, the creditor withdrew the debt from Hardy's hands. Thereupon Hardy and Co. made another charge of 7s. on the amount withdrawn, pointing in justification for this to a note on their prospectus, where an announcement in large type: "No commission is charged on unrecovered amounts," is followed by the further notice in type so small as to be almost illegible: "excepting debts if withdrawn for no cause whilst in course of collection, in which case 2s. in the £ on amount of debt."

Hardy and Co.'s full style and address are "The United Kingdom, Colonial, and Foreign General Agency Offices, Royal Courts Chambers, 70, 71, 72, Chancery-lane," etc., and their trade prospectus is adorned with an imposing picture of these premises. In point of fact they only occupy a room in this building, which is generally closed, and their business communications bear the post mark "Finsbury Park." It would seem, therefore, that their City address is nothing but an accommodation one for the receipt of letters.

There is nothing left to wonder at in anything that the Times does in these days; but a few years ago one would have been amazed to see the following advertisement appearing, as it has done, again and again in its columns:—

LARGE HOUSE WANTED.—A gentleman, having a quantity of valuable furniture (now warehoused), which he wishes to sell by auction, would be willing to pay a liberal rent for the use of a large house in a good neighbourhood for one month. Commission to agent introducing. Apply A. B., etc.

Everybody knows what this means—everybody, at least, who knows enough of the world around him to manage the advertising department of a daily paper. The large house in a good neighbourhood is wanted, at a liberal rent, because the furniture which is to be sold—doubtless in the ordinary course of trade—will fetch prices far in excess of its value by the mere fact that it is found in such a house. The trick is in evidence constantly, and a flagrant example of it was given in Truth a few weeks ago, in the case of a sale held in South Kensington. But to find the trick systematically worked through the agency of Printing House-square is a novel and unpleasant "sign of the Times."

The following piece of impudence seems to deserve gibbeting: A Mr. C. P. Taylor, of Shrubbery Road, Streatham, writes to a well-known Sheffield firm that he possesses two rare works of interest to Sheffield and the cutlery trade, which he will be pleased to forward on receipt of 7s. 6d. The firm, instead of putting the letter into the waste-paper basket, as they would be perfectly entitled to do, take the trouble to send Mr. Taylor a postcard, stating that they have no use for the books. Mr. Taylor returns the postcard in an unstamped envelope, with the following memorandum written across it:—

The next time a gentleman goes out of his way to offer you a very scarce book, write in a proper manner—not on a postcard—and thank him for his courtesy.

Mr. Taylor's ideas of gentlemanly conduct are more evident in his theory than in his practice. I am curious to know whether any other people have had experience of his gentlemanly attentions.

A collector, described to me by a friend as "a decidedly attractive young lady," has lately been at work in Brighton for "the London Samaritan Collecting Fund," which is the nom de guerre of my old friends Mesdames Morton and Pass. It is some time since I heard of these ladies, and I was in hopes that they had found some more useful means of supporting themselves than by collecting money from unsuspecting persons for the alleged purpose of providing free meals for "the aged poor, and crippled and destitute children" during the winter. From numbers of testimonials printed with their appeal it would seem that certain persons testify to free meals having been provided by the two ladies during the last six years; but I doubt if those which the aged poor and the children have enjoyed in this way equal either in quality or quantity the number which Mrs. Morton and Mrs. Pass have consumed during the same time at the expense of the subscribers.

The said testimonials are curiosities in their way. A Mr. Robert H. Parsons, of Southville, Wandsworth-road, returning thanks on behalf of his teachers to Morton and Pass, dates his letter, "October 21, 1902-3." A Mr. George Dale, who describes himself as "superintendent" of the Custom-street Mission Hall, dates his letter, "December, 1901-2-3-4-5," and March 1, 1906." A gentleman named Josiah Foster dates in the same way from "Victoria Docks Union Church, January, 1901-2-3-4-5," while "Sister Nellie," of the Wesleyan Seamen's Mission, Three Colt-street, E., gives the date of her testimonial as "February 2, 1900, and January, 1901-2-3-4." It is manifestly absurd to suppose that anybody would write letters and date them in this way unless acting in collusion with Mrs. Morton and Mrs. Pass, which I have no reason to suppose is the case. It is really time that the operations of these two females were stopped. My own feeling is that their energies would be better employed in a little oakum-picking.

"Probably the change of address may be of interest," writes a correspondent, in forwarding a communication "re concert tickets" which he has received from R. H. P. Wilson, Trematon Cottage, Albury-road, Streatham. The change is certainly worth noting, Wilson having figured in my recent Cautionary List with an address at Clapham Junction. He makes pitiful appeals to strangers to buy tickets for benefit concerts which he is getting up. Strangers, however, would do well to turn a deaf ear to his importunities, for he is a rascal quite undeserving of any sympathy. Begging and swindling have been his professions for twenty years, and besides six months' hard labour he has undergone a sentence of three years' penal servitude for forgery.

With reference to a paragraph which appeared in last week's Truth under the heading of "Motors and Motoring," Mr. Filson Young writes:—

The writer of your article is right in supposing that I have always endeavoured to promote considerateness in the driving of motor cars, and, in so far as my own small example is worth anything, to drive considerately myself. He quotes, however, in contradiction to these facts, the circumstance that I admitted driving a car over a flying mile on the Bath road at over sixty miles an hour. If he is familiar with the Marlborough Downs he must know that there are exposed stretches of that road, perfectly straight and visible for more than a mile, on which such a speed is perfectly safe; and it was on such a stretch of open empty road that I carried out the test mentioned.

"Truth" will be sent weekly to any address in the United Kingdom for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or 28s. for 12 months. . . . . . I am no more ashamed of having driven at the speed mentioned on a straight, empty moorland road than I should be proud of driving at twenty miles an hour on many roads where such a speed is legally authorised.

I must ask you also to correct a grave mistake which your correspondent has made. He says that the test was made "apparently for advertising purposes." In making this statement your contributor has fallen into an error, which, however little he may have intended it, is, in fact, impertinent and unjustifiable. I have never driven a motor car a single yard for advertising purposes, or to serve any other purpose than my own pleasure, instruction, or scientific interest.

Of course I accept at once Mr. Filson Young's statement that he did not make the test in question for advertising purposes, but at the same time, having regard to the use that has nevertheless been made of it as an advertisement of the car, I think that my contributor's mistake was not impertinent or inexcusable. I think, too, that it is not in the interests of automobilism as a whole that such a performance as the driving of a car at sixty miles an hour on a public road, even though it is a straight, empty, moorland road, should be advertised.

THE "PREVIOUS" PEER.

(An Incident of the Opening of Parliament.)

He sat him in the sacred place
Which ducal forms are wont to grace.

It simply may have meant, no doubt,
He hadn't learnt his way about;

Or, p'rhaps, his mind's so long been set
Upon a ducal coronet,

He'd, for the moment, clean forgot
That he as yet a duke was not.

His friends make jocular complaint
Of such unusual self-restraint,

Which stopped at ducal bench alone,

Mr. Henry Broadhurst writes:—

During the Parliament of 1880 Lord Goschen favoured me with many talks on social and political subjects, chiefly concerning their effect upon the working classes. It is quite true that he had the gravest doubts as to the wisdom of entrusting the labouring people with the Franchise. This was not because he did not like the people—it was, as he expressed it to me, because he feared that demagogues might lead them astray on questions of great national importance, and he specifically mentioned that of Protection v. Free Trade, on which most deceptive but alluring promises might be made.

I distinctly remember doing my best to assure him that he might trust them on that subject, and especially in the case of those of us who remembered the hungry forties. On the occasion of his "gamble with the food of the people" speech, I wrote reminding him of our conversation then, more than twenty years ago. He acknowledged my note, and remembered the incident. My retirement from Parliament immediately after the late General Election prevented me seeing him in the last Session, or I should have spoken with him again on the results of the polls in January, 1906.

In the campaign of mendacious slander that is now being directed against the London County Council there is one reflection which I should think must occur to even the most ignorant of London voters. How is it that we only hear of these things at election times? The campaign is being waged on behalf of the Moderates, or "Municipal Reformers," as they have dubbed themselves for electioneering purposes. How is it that during the three years' life of the present Council the Moderate Councillors have had nothing to say about all the administrative fatuities which fill the pages of papers like the Daily Mail and the Evening News? The answer is very simple. The County Council is an executive body in the work of which all members take their share. The particular proceedings which are now used in the manufacture of electioneering capital are the work of committees, on which there is never any very serious friction or difference of opinion, and in most cases one party on the Council is as much responsible for them as another. It is only at election times that this or that piece of business is raked up, distorted, misrepresented, and held up to the electors as proof of the fatuous idiocy of the majority on the Council.

People who understand nothing of the business of municipal bodies imagine that parties on a County Council are in the same position as in the House of Commons, and that there is a sort of Government in office, supported by the majority, and resisted at all points by the Opposition. This is simply nonsense, and if the position were properly understood—namely, that all executive business is transacted by committees composed of men of both parties—there would be no room for the wild fictions that are now being so busily circulated, and no elector would be misled by them. A Moderate candidate, called to account the other day for repeating the fairy tale about the "blankets scandal," which had been knocked on the head at the previous meeting of the Council, justified himself by the argument that "the party in power" is responsible for everything the Council does. There is nothing either in the theory or the practice of the Council to warrant any such contention, and in this very instance a Moderate member of the committee under whose jurisdiction the blankets fell, had not only accepted his share of the responsibility, but protested against the use that was being made of the story—a story which was as to nine-tenths of it fiction, and as to the remaining tenth pointless.

Precisely the same thing may be said about the "Norbury brickfield" business, out of which a fictitious "scandal" has been created by evidence of a very questionable character. There has been no serious question between Moderates and Progressives in regard to this brickfield; and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that, had the majority on the committee been Moderates, the brickfield would not have been worked exactly as it has been. The reasons for it were sound, and by overwhelming evidence the result justifies what has been done. All these electioneering libels are libels, not on the majority of the Council, but on the Council collectively, and in many cases Moderate Councillors have had the decency to recognise this and repudiate the falsehoods. But the plain truth is that the present campaign is inspired altogether from outside the Council, and with no object but to wreck its work and destroy its influence.

If money can do it, this end will be accomplished. But in some cases it would really seem that the means employed must defeat their own end. One of the most audacious fictions propagated since the election has been in sight represents the County Council as having raised the debt of London to over 100 millions. This figure is arrived at by adding together all the debts of all the municipal authorities in London, including the 40 millions of the Water Board, and I believe also the debt of the City Corporation. The amount for which the County Council is responsible is about a third of the total, and, unlike the debts of most of the authorities, it includes large sums invested in tramways and other remunerative enterprises—that is to say, capital. Now this fiction of a 100 million County Council debt has actually been embodied in their election address by the "Municipal Reform" candidates for Norwood. How can any ratepayer who takes the trouble to ascertain facts for himself vote for a candidate who commits himself to such a statement? Even taking the most favourable view, that the statement is put forward in sheer ignorance, how can a man so hopelessly in the dark about the municipal business of London be a fit person to serve on the County Council? What qualification can he possibly possess for the self-imposed mission of a "municipal reformer"?

I am glad that Mr. John Burns intends to introduce a Bill to enable every conscientious objector to vaccination to obtain the relief which the Act of 1898 was intended to grant him, but which has too often been withheld by self-opinionated magistrates bent upon rendering null and void a law of which they disapproved. In some districts the Act has been fairly administered, but in others the great unpaid have practically set it at defiance, refusing exemptions in cases where it was manifest that they ought to have been granted, and adding insult to injury by their methods of brow-beating and ridiculing the applicants. Though not an anti-vaccinator myself—the question is one upon which I really have no settled convictions—I have always strongly protested against these proceedings.

For one reason, it has seemed to me a monstrous and intolerable state of things that magistrates should be permitted to obstruct the working of an Act simply because they disagree with its provisions. For another reason, it has meant the infliction of gross hardship and injustice on many citizens. The magistrates can refuse a certificate of exemption, but they cannot compel a conscientious objector to have his child vaccinated; all that they can do is to subject him to various penalties as a defaulter, and thereby—as the report of the Royal Commission showed—strengthen the anti-vaccination movement by making him appear—as indeed he is—a victim of persecution. That movement has probably gained many hundreds of adherents mainly owing to the short-sighted and pig-headed policy of pro-vaccinist Shallows in over-riding the spirit if not the letter of the law. It is apparently intended that under the new Bill the granting of a certificate of exemption shall no longer be left to the discretion—save the mark!—of the magistrates, but shall be obligatory on the applicant making a simple statutory declaration of his conscientious objection to vaccination.

THE ILLOGICAL LAURUSTINUS.

A little Laurustinus grew
Hard by a stark and stalwart Yew,
Who, pitying the fragile Thing,
Did take it underneath his Wing,
And sheltered, with protecting Care,
From scorching Sun and biting Air.
Yet eke he managed, so they say,
To twist his Boughs in such a Way
That no Obstruction they present
To his small Friend's Development,
Who thus, of Interference void,
A full Protection still enjoyed.
  Long flourished Laurustinus there,
Beneath Dan Yew's indulgent Care,
Until, at length, conceited grown,
She took an independent Tone,
And thus, with upstart Air, expressed
The Thoughts that filled her swelling Breast:
  "Far, far too long, upon my Soul,
I've played Subjection's meagre Rôle!
Who's Yew, that I should live, till Age,
Dependent on his Patronage,
And humble Thanks obsequious owe
For what he deigneth to bestow?
No more for me this servile Game,
Henceforward equal Rights I'll claim,
To Tree exalt myself from Shrub,
And Branches with His Lordship rub!"
  She said, and forth her Branches threw
To try Conclusions with the Yew,
Who, rigid, met the Shrub's Attack,
And firm, yet gentle, forced her back.
So when her Impotence she found
Miss Laurustinus changed her Ground,
And Coward now Dan Yew did dub
For shoving thus a helpless Shrub.
To whom Dan Yew, in Accents dry,
Made this succinctly shrewd Reply:
  "'Tis plain at once you cannot be
Both helpless Shrub and pushful Tree,
Nor, while aggressive Strength's your Aim,
The Privilege of Weakness claim."

SCRUTATOR.

THE GOVERNMENT BILL OF FARE.

THE King's Speech offers Parliament plenty to do for the next few months, and there is something in the bill of fare to suit every guest at table. If Ministers succeed before the end of the Session in carrying a new Army Scheme, reforming Irish Government, solving the "housing" question, re-modelling the Licensing Laws, and re-adjusting the relations of the two Houses in a satisfactory fashion, in addition to passing eight or ten minor measures, they will have satisfied all reasonable requirements, on their own side of the House, at any rate, and can afford to laugh at Mr. Balfour's inability to discover that they possess anything in the shape of a "constructive" policy. One cannot judge a dinner by the menu, and the various measures promised must be seen before they can be considered on their merits; but at least the Government may be credited with a business-like zeal. And it may also be said that in regard to the two chief items—Ireland and the House of Lords—their utterances promise well. Mr. Birrell's first speech as Chief Secretary was excellent in spirit and in matter, and as this was the Irish opinion as well as the English, he has begun well. Equally good was his speech on Lord Clanricarde and the evicted tenants question, in proof of which there is the unsolicited testimony of Mr. Walter Long. The idea that a landlord who manages his estate on Clanricarde principles should be treated as unfit to have the control of his own property, for his own sake as well as his neighbours', contains just that mixture of humour and sound sense in which Mr. Birrell is at his best.

What constitutes the King's Speech of 1907 an epoch-making document is the reference in it, for the first time in history, to the House of Lords question. That this event should not come till 1907 is a remarkable proof of the slowness with which political events move in this country, and incidentally of the little need we have of a permanent bulwark against "hasty and ill-considered legislation." It is just on thirteen years since Mr. Gladstone took his leave of Parliamentary life, and solemnly bequeathed to his successors the duty of demolishing the power of the House of Lords as the first step to any effectual legislative achievement by the Liberal Party. It has taken all that time to bring the Party back to the point at which Mr. Gladstone left it; but at last the task is to be taken in hand. The definition of the task in the King's Speech is precisely on the right lines, as I have always understood them. There is no suggestion for the present of reforming the Upper House. It is a question of "the relations between the two Houses," which can only mean the unrestricted power of the Upper House to reject once and for all measures carried by the Lower. It would be a fatal error to lose sight of this point by starting with some contentious proposal for altering the constitution of the Upper House; for, in the first place, as things are at present the reform of the House of Lords must rest entirely with the House of Lords itself, since it can reject any scheme proposed by the Commons of which it does not approve; and, in the second place, any reform must be calculated to increase the authority and strength of the House of Lords, and to do this while the unrestricted veto remains would be to step out of the frying-pan into the fire. Moreover, if an attempt to amend the constitution of the House were made before its powers in regard to legislation have been limited, the new constitution would have to be shaped with some regard to the existing powers, which would introduce fresh difficulties into the problem and fresh ground of contention between the two Houses. When the permanent veto on legislation has been got rid of, the precise composition of the Upper House will cease to be a question of serious consequence to either of the Parliamentary parties, and there will be so much the better chance of constructing a second chamber with sole regard to obtaining the best possible class of members for the purposes which such a chamber is designed to serve. Every consideration, therefore, suggests that the veto is the first point of attack.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, in his few remarks on the subject last week, expressed the opinion that the problem is not so difficult as many people suppose. He is quite right. The course to be pursued is perfectly simple, and, with all respect to Sir Lawson Walton, it involves no nearer an approach to a "revolution" than did the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832. A Bill limiting the Lords' veto to one session should be passed by the House of Commons. We may take for granted that it will be rejected by the Lords point blank. Whether there should be a dissolution upon it at once would probably depend upon the King. With or without a dissolution, and assuming that the country supported the Government at a general election, if held, the Bill should be again passed in the following session, and returned to the Lords with an intimation that if it be again rejected the number of peers necessary to carry it will be created at once. Whether the Lords force the question to that extremity or yield to the inevitable gracefully, is immaterial to the result; but that they would yield as they did in 1832 may pretty well be taken for granted, seeing that resistance would be futile, and that aristocratic esprit de corps would be all against the swamping of the Peerage with some 600 new men. We have also to remember that the vast majority of the Peers, however conservative and tenacious of their ancient rights by instinct, are ordinary sensible men, who know at heart, as does every Conservative in the House of Commons, that the present power of the Upper House is an indefensible anachronism, and its suppression in a democratic age only a question of a few years more or less. This knowledge is not conducive to the spirit which fights to a finish, or yields only to "revolution." The solution of the whole difficulty is therefore quite as simple as Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman believes, and if he

PENSIONS AND MILITARY SERVICE.

As the Chancellor of the Exchequer, like everybody else, is so anxious to make a start with old age pensions, but, like many other people, does not see how or where to begin, I make a present of a suggestion which may be of use to the Secretary of State for War as well as his colleagues. It is that we should start by giving old age pensions for military service, whether in the regular Army, the Militia, or the Volunteers. The pensions might be graded according to the nature of the service; for example, the regular soldier who completes twelve or fourteen years, mostly of foreign service, should receive 1s. 6d. a day, and he might come into it at the age of sixty; the militiaman and the volunteer might have a shilling a day at the age of sixty-five, with an opportunity of increasing it if they reach a certain class of proficiency. Whether or not the charge should be placed on the Army Estimates in the case of the auxiliary army is a matter of detail; but I may point out that if this were done, there is a possibility that the charge might not be a very heavy one, because it is an essential part of my suggestion that all military pensions should be of the "deferred" order. The present system of pensioning for life men who are discharged at forty seems to me wrong in principle, and it is one of the causes of the high cost of our Army. If no pensions became payable until fifty-five or sixty, except in case of disablement for work, the present pension charge would be very substantially reduced.

Looking at the matter purely from the political point of view, I appreciate that "Labour" might kick at first against anything that looked like an attempt to connect old-age pensions with military service. But if the thing were done in the right way, I think that such objections could be avoided or overcome. It is pretty generally agreed that we want to get more men, and a better class of men, for military service, especially in the Army and Militia, and the offer of pensions is the cheapest way of getting them, as well as the most effectual, because it appeals to the best class of men. In fact, the chief difficulty which I anticipate from the adoption of this plan is that we should get many more Volunteers and Militiamen than we have any use for.

When Mr. Haldane's scheme for the reorganisation of the auxiliary forces is presented, I hope that the Government will be perfectly frank with the Labour men on the subject of military service—as Mr. Haldane has endeavoured to be in many of the speeches that he has made lately. I do not believe that the working classes as a whole doubt the necessity for a properly organised home army on a militia basis, or that they are averse to the State dealing fairly, not to say liberally, with all men who undertake a few years' military service in whatever class of troops. But they are very shy of any steps in the direction of compulsion, and they hate the spirit which is vaguely described as "militarism"; and it is therefore necessary to have a clear understanding with their leaders as to what is and is not necessary in the shape of an army, and what is and is not the duty of the State in regard to the working men who serve in it. It is no doubt true that "Labour" is unsympathetic towards soldiering at present. But this attitude is not without reason, and the best way to alter it is to recognise that the question of soldiering is essentially a Labour question, and to discuss it on that footing.

The other day the Preston Trades Council was deeply exercised over the fact that short-service soldiers had been introduced into one of the bakeries of the town in order that they might learn the trade. A unionist had been asked to teach the men; and the union, after considering the question, had decided not to allow him to do so. The Bakers' Union having referred the matter to the Trades Council, several delegates described it as a most serious question, and its further consideration was postponed until the next meeting, apparently with a view that the matter might be brought before the Labour Members of Parliament. There was no reason whatever, so far as I can see, for this excitement except the fact that it was proposed to teach a trade to a soldier. If there was any question of some technical trade-union rule in regard to the terms on which the teaching was to be given, it was kept altogether in the background. I confess I am quite unable to understand the trade union view of this class of question, and therefore I attribute it to want of clear thinking on the other side. The soldier is, with very rare exceptions, a man of the working class. He is taken from it, and he reverts to it. In what way, then, are working-class interests injured by his being educated as a working man while he is serving? A more serious question still arises in connection with the preferential employment of discharged soldiers in the public service. A few months ago an important Labour deputation waited on the Prime Minister to protest against such preference. I was sorry to see that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman received them sympathetically, and expressed general approval of their views. It seemed to me that he would have done better to tackle them boldly and point out to them that the whole object of the proposed arrangement is to secure fair treatment by the State for its servants of the working class. Some 30,000 or 40,000 young men of that class are taken by the State every year for service in the regular Army; and according to the system which has hitherto prevailed, are chucked away at the end of their time, good for very little except to recruit the ranks of the unemployed, and fill the casual wards. The working classes can have no interest in perpetuating this state of things. Their whole interest is that those working men who enter the service of the State should enter it as far as possible permanently, or, if they have to be discharged, that they should be discharged with every assistance that can be given them to prevent their suffering by having spent seven or eight years in the public service. It is very important that the Government should fight this question out with the trade unions and their parliamentary representatives, not in any hostile spirit, but fairly and squarely by friendly discussion, with a view to a rational understanding on both sides. And if that course is taken, I believe that the representatives of Labour will show their usual common sense in realising where the true interest of working men lies.

THE ABUSES OF MEDICAL TRADE UNIONISM.

In last week's article on the dispute between Dr. John Shaw and the Royal College of Physicians the opinion was expressed that medical practitioners ought to have a right of appeal to the High Court against the removal of their names from the Medical Register. As bearing upon this suggestion, I would call attention to the judgment delivered two or three weeks ago by Mr. Justice Warrington in the case of Clifford v. Timms. Mr. Clifford is a dentist and one of the directors of the American Dental Institute, carrying on also a private practice. He took Mr. Timms into partnership in his private practice, under an agreement which provided that Mr. Timms was to carry on the business in his own name, Mr. Clifford being a sleeping partner; and there was a clause in the agreement to the effect that if either partner should be "guilty of professional misconduct or of any act which is calculated to bring discredit upon or injure the other partner or the partnership business, the other partner shall be at liberty to give notice in writing of his intention to determine the partnership, and thereupon the partnership shall be dissolved." In the course of last year Mr. Clifford was reported to the General Medical Council for certain irregularities in connection with the American Dental Institute. The charges were that the Institute employed unregistered assistants, and that it advertised in an objectionable way by pamphlets, etc. reference being particularly made to an article in the Review of Reviews reflecting on English dentists and dentistry, for which the Institute paid 100 gs. The Dental Committee of the General Medical Council found that Mr. Clifford had been "guilty of infamous and disgraceful conduct in a professional respect," and his name was ordered to be removed from the dentists' register. Thereupon Mr. Timms gave notice to determine the partnership under the clause above mentioned, and Mr. Clifford brought his action, claiming a declaration that this notice was invalid and that the partnership still subsisted. Mr. Justice Warrington gave judgment in his favour.

It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the decision of the General Medical Council was binding on the Court, and that the Judge could not go behind it, the Council being a statutory body empowered to decide upon questions of professional misconduct. The learned Judge did not accept this contention. He drew a distinction between the kind of professional misconduct over which the Council has jurisdiction and the professional misconduct contemplated by the partnership agreement; and he expressed the opinion that even if the issue had been whether the plaintiff was guilty of the misconduct mentioned in the statute, the decision of the Council "would not have been admissible in proof of that fact, being res inter alios acta." He pointed out that on the evidence of the President of the Council the professional misconduct referred to in the statute would "be held by the Council to include certain breaches of professional etiquette which could not in my judgment be properly described as professional misconduct;" in other words, he treated the statutory expression, "infamous and disgraceful conduct in a professional respect," as having a narrow technical signification, which he declined to extend to an ordinary legal agreement dealing with "professional misconduct." That, at any rate, is how I understand his Lordship. The employment of unregistered assistants was not, he said, contrary to any rule of professional conduct; and after reading the advertisements of the American Dental Institute, he saw no professional misconduct in their publication, advertising being admittedly allowed in the dental profession.

The decision, therefore, seems to amount to this, that though a man may be struck off the register for certain breaches of professional etiquette which the General Medical Council construes as "infamous and disgraceful conduct in a professional respect" within the meaning of its statutory powers, this does not prove him to have been guilty of anything that can be called professional misconduct outside the General Medical Council-room; and that when the Court has to decide whether particular acts amount to professional misconduct it will form its own opinion quite independently of professional rules which have been imported into the construction of the Act by the Council. It is easy to see from this that if an appeal lay in law from the Council to the High Court on a question of the removal of a man's name from the register, the definition of "infamous and disgraceful conduct in a professional respect" might be very considerably narrowed. The power freely exercised by the General Medical Council to strike men off the register for some breach of professional rules in regard to advertising or what not, although there is no imputation either upon their personal honour or their professional abilities, has always seemed to me oppressive and dangerous. It appears still more so in view of Mr. Justice Warrington's decision.

An incident which occurred in the course of the trial of this case throws some useful light on the way in which the power of the Council is exercised. The Registrar of the General Medical Council had been called by the defendant on a subpœna duces tecum to produce documents which had been before the Council when the plaintiff's case was considered by them. On behalf of the Council objection was made to the production of these documents; and it was contended that "if all documents of a confidential nature which were brought before the Council in disciplinary cases were liable to be brought before the Court in cases of this kind, it would be impossible for the Council to conduct its inquiries." Mr. Justice Warrington looked at one of the documents before deciding the point, and ultimately, in giving his judgment, ruled, for the reasons above indicated, that the documents were not admissible. But the point which is of most interest is the revelation that the Council acts in cases of this kind upon private and confidential documents, and regards them as so sacred that it objects to produce them in Court when the reasons for its decision are in question. If, as I contend, the powers of the Council are essentially oppressive and dangerous, how much more so do they become when it is seen that the proceedings of the Council are founded upon evidence of such a nature, that if it were disclosed the operations of the Council would become impossible! I believe I am right in saying that even the man who is on his trial before the Council is kept in the dark as to much of the evidence against him; and it is a fair presumption that this is so, for if the evidence were disclosed to him there would no longer be any possibility of that secrecy which the Council claims for it. The Council, in short, seems to follow a procedure for which the only parallel is that connected with the Lion's Mouth at Venice. Any man can write any lie about another and transmit it to the General Medical Council in the full assurance that neither his identity nor the statement he has made will ever be disclosed; and the man incriminated is called upon to defend himself without knowing what defamatory allegations have been secretly made to the Council against him. It is not too much to say that this course of procedure is simply abominable and incompatible with the proper administration of justice. Outside the profession this will hardly be disputed; and even within the profession I doubt if the procedure will be defended by any one except the small ring by which the law is administered.

It is quite possible and logical, as I said last week, to recognise the necessity and utility of professional organisation for restraining individual competition while objecting to the grant of excessive powers for this purpose, or condemning the manner in which the powers are used. That the professional organisation should become tyrannical and unjust is no more for the interest of the profession than of the public. As regards the profession, it is a common matter of complaint, as has been repeatedly shown in these columns, that the powers of the medical organisation are used in a way which combines the maximum of tyranny towards small practitioners with the minimum of regard for their general welfare. A case was noticed in Truth only last summer in which a humble practitioner was kicked out of the profession after twenty years' practice, notwithstanding his apologies and appeals for mercy for the sake of his wife and family, because, after severing his connection with a medical benefit club, which had been objected to by his brother medicos, he incautiously sent a postcard notifying this fact and mentioning that he would continue to receive patients privately. That a family man of middle age should be deprived of his means of livelihood and thrown helpless on the world for such a reason as this is as revolting to the sense of justice as to the sentiment of humanity. It is very doubtful whether the general practitioner has any substantial interest in the crusade against advertising which is carried on so busily and remorselessly by the British Medical Association, with the General Medical Council at its back. On the other hand, it is perfectly certain that in the upper grades of the profession, advertising, less frank but far more effectual than that of the little club doctor in the above case, is practised systematically and with enormous profit, and that the British Medical Association and the General Medical Council are powerless to stop it—even if they have any desire to do so, which is improbable.

In a recent issue of the General Practitioner I see some strong observations on an advertisement for a doctor for the Petworth Park Friendly Society, the terms offered being such that the holder of the appointment would have to undertake all cases within a radius of seven miles—all-night midwifery cases, for example—at a remuneration working out at less than 3s. per head per annum. The first business of a trade union being to stop sweating, it might be supposed that the British Medical Association would long since have laid down a union scale of wages for club doctors, based on the "living wage" principle. But this does not seem to have been attempted. Any luckless struggling practitioner may take the sweater's terms for the sake of daily bread; but if the club that he serves on these terms advertises for members and uses his name, God help him! The precious Medico-Ethical Section of the British Medical Association will have him before the Council in an instant, and the Council will not think twice about depriving him of the right to practise, and packing him off with his wife and children to the nearest workhouse. Meantime, the County Hospital may advertise the imposing list of its staff in every newspaper, and send it to every householder from whom it solicits subscriptions, without a word of objection from any professional authority.

It is the same with other questions vitally affecting the small practitioner. Notoriously, private medical practice has been grievously injured by the abuse of free treatment at the hospitals. The charitable public is equally aggrieved by this abuse, for its money is applied to purposes for which it is not intended. Why does not the professional organisation move in this matter? Because the organisation is ruled by the few who are interested in the enlargement of hospital practice and have little concern for the welfare of the general practitioner, and still less for the rights of subscribers to hospitals. One sees the same state of things in another matter constantly under notice in these columns, the development of quackery and the inadequacy of the law against fraudulent unqualified practitioners. Here again the public interest is identical with that of the general practitioner. Again and again I have asked why the medical profession does not move to obtain an amendment of the law which will check the unauthorised practice of medicine. Again and again I have had from doctors the same answer—because the profession is ruled by men who have no interest in this matter, the quack only entering into competition with the general practitioner. It follows naturally that when a Bill is promoted in the name of the profession—there is one in the air at the present moment—for the purpose of amending the Medical Acts, its primary object is to increase the disciplinary powers of the professional oligarchy, not to remedy abuses which concern the public, or even the average doctor.

I mention these matters to show that the tendency of medical trade-unionism as at present constituted is not conducive to the best interests of the public or the profession. The case of Dr. John Shaw, described last week, exemplifies this tendency under yet another set of circumstances. A physician of good standing in practice in the West End of London questions the expediency of the treatment of a certain disease which is for the moment in vogue, and alleges it to be the prolific source of a worse evil than that which it is designed to cure. Finding himself refused a hearing by the profession, he publishes a book which avowedly appeals to the laity. He is called to account by the Royal College of Physicians for violating the rules of professional conduct and communicating to patients what they ought not to have their attention called to. Recognising that if he does not desist from the course he is taking he will probably be handed over to the tender mercies of the General Medical Council, he resigns his membership of the College, and voluntarily removes his name from the medical register. Here we see the power of the professional organisation over its members used to prevent the public discussion of a question of profound public importance, and to keep patients in the dark about a matter in which they are vitally interested. When the powers of the medical colleges and the General Medical Council were conferred, it was never contemplated that they should be used for such a purpose. This use is therefore an abuse, which ought to be restrained; and I can see no more effectual way of restraining it than by making the functions of the General Medical Council in respect to the removal of names from the register subject to appeal to the High Court. The whole question calls urgently for the attention of Parliament, and when it is raised there it is to be hoped that the general body of medical practitioners will realise that their own interest in the matter is essentially identical with that of the public.

I have received the following letter from Dr. Shaw, which will help to explain the technical question at issue between him and the professional authorities:—

32, New Cavendish Street, Portland Place, London, W.,
February 14, 1907.

Dear Sir,—I cannot thank you too heartily for the article in yesterday's issue of your journal. There is, however, one misconception which I should be grateful if you would correct. It has apparently arisen from the correspondence with the College of Physicians covering two distinct although related works:—"Fibroid Tumour," nominally the subject of "the principal charge," and a book still in the press, "The Cure of Cancer: and how Surgery Blocks the Way," which I assumed (without justification, it would appear) to be the real offence.

In "Fibroid Tumour" I showed the reasons for concluding that the real mortality from hysterectomy (removal of the womb) was more than five hundred times greater than that alleged by the British Medical Journal, and four times that referred to by the late Dr. Thomas Keith, as constituting the operation under specified conditions a criminal act. The operation entails, moreover, increased liability to the subsequent development of cancer.

In the work shortly to be issued, the premises are predicated from which I conclude that operation is, of all the factors tending to the increased mortality from cancer, the most dominant. Cancer has been steadily increasing for a number of years. The improved conditions of operation during the last ten years—so far from arresting that increase—have resulted in the increment for the three years 1901 to 1904 exceeding that for the thirty years 1868 to 1898, cancer of the female breast being taken as the illustration, because it is free from any question of improved diagnosis constituting an error, and is at the same time the direction in which operative zeal has been most immediately applied.

The newly-issued report of the Registrar-General for 1905 supplies the data from which it may be ascertained that this year—the year in which the surgeon quoted in my letter desired "to protest as strongly and as publicly as possible against the increasing tendency to record such isolated cases" of alleged cure of cancer by other than operative measures—was the first since the improved methods and conditions of operation came into vogue in which there was a substantial drop (about 3½ per cent.) in the mortality from cancer of the female breast. Stated briefly, my argument is, that operation is far more effectual as a cause than as a cure for cancer. What I claim is, that my facts and figures shall be explained or refuted, not by "impressions," but by figures and facts.—With heartfelt thanks, I remain, faithfully yours,

John Shaw.

A PEER ON THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

On Wednesday last a gentleman called upon me at this office, refusing to give his name, but alleging business of urgent importance. When he was shown in I recognised him as one of the younger members of the Upper House and the bearer of an ancient name. His object, in brief, was to apply for a position on the staff of Truth. He was strongly of opinion that the House of Lords was threatened with abolition; he was also contemplating matrimony. With the loss of his position as hereditary legislator he anticipated also the jeopardising of the profession which was hitherto his sole source of income—that of director of public companies. I was able to reassure him to some extent, by pointing out that if the titled directorate had survived the financial scandals associated with it in the recent past it could afford to smile at such a minor happening as the abolition of the Lords. He saw little prospect, again, that a Conservative Government would return to power during the next twenty years, and thus could not look forward to the Under-Secretaryship or other lucrative trifle which would in that case have been his by right of birth. Yet again, his fiancée—a young lady who has achieved eminence in musical comedy—insisted that he should find something to do to keep him out of mischief, as she explained, and refused to fix the day for their marriage until he could vouch for the possession of an income of at least one-twentieth of her own. Journalism had occurred to him as a means of remedying his fortunes, partly because it was already famous, even in the House of Lords, as the last refuge for the destitute, partly because he had, in his own words, seen a good deal of life in his time, which he thought might come in useful. He frankly admitted that he was but imperfectly educated, having been at Eton and Christ Church, but supposed that there must be others no better off than himself in this respect. Truth had recently come under his notice as having published certain strictures—he admitted them to be well-deserved—upon one of his relations, who, having suffered reverses, had set up in business as a turf-tipster. He added, with admirable candour, that he was in entire disagreement with Truth upon political questions, and that he was accustomed to speak of it as a rag. Failing a staff appointment, he would be willing to come to a business arrangement, upon the basis of a commission on results, by which he should push the sale of the paper among those of his friends who might not already be subscribers. Failing that, he believed that I should find him useful in connection with my exposure of turf-tipsters, moneylenders, and the like, of whose operations he declared himself to have personal experience second to none. Finally, if I could make use of him in no other way, could I not give him a job as an advertisement canvasser? Appreciating his willingness to work, and being always ready to help those who show any desire to abandon a life of idleness in favour of honest industry, I asked him to write me an article, on any current topic that occurred to him, that I might judge of his capabilities The following is the result:—

After talking the matter over with Jessie—who has three times my brains—I do not see that I can find anything better to write about than the Radical proposals to abolish the House of Lords, especially as I am personally interested. I do not myself see—and neither does Jessie—exactly what good they expect it to do. For one thing, those countries that have not got anything of the sort do not seem much better off than we are. We boast—I mean the newspapers do—about being the freest and the happiest and the generally best sort of country going, and we have become so with a House of Lords, mind you. And it cannot be said that we should have got on any better without them, for you have only got to look at other countries where there are not any, and they are certainly no better off than we are. Look at France; they are grumbling and quarrelling and plotting to overthrow the Government all the time; they are just as discontented, in fact, as they know how to be. And as to America, well, we may have a House of Lords, but how about their Trusts?

For another thing, I do not believe it would be at all popular to do away with us. People try to make out that the Peers are of no service to anybody, and are not looked up to any more, and all that sort of nonsense. I know better, and I can prove it out of my own personal experience. The lady I am engaged to—I wish I was clever enough to set down how beautiful she is, and what a thoroughly good sort, and how clever. There are a lot of fools who try to sneer at people of our sort who marry actresses; if I could only make them understand all that Jessie's done for me, and how she pulled me up just at the time I was going to go an absolute cropper, and how she's helped me to lead a straight life and made a decent man of me, they would just see where the real truth of the matter lies. She's not a bit of a snob either, so it is not as if she was set on wearing a coronet, or anything of that sort. I can give you a case in point. Her mother, Mrs. Perks, always makes out that old Perks was an officer in the Indian Army, while Jessie told me quite openly that he was really only a private in a line regiment. And, what is more—but about the Lords. Jessie was only getting quite a small salary when we got engaged. But as soon as it was made public she was offered another £100 a week right off. It only shows what a good sort she is, that she wanted to hand me over half of it, because, she said, I had quite as much to do with getting it as she had. Naturally, I could not think of such a thing, so she is saving it up in case we should want it after we are married. But it just shows that the public are not as sick of the Peerage as the Radicals want to make out, and that we are not so absolutely useless either.

If they did abolish us I can't see where they could find a better lot to put in our place. They say we are one-sided, always backing up the Conservatives and throwing out Radical Bills. But if they turned us out and put a lot of Radicals in our places, I don't see that they would be a bit less one-sided, only it would be the Conservative Bills they would throw out. Then again, they profess to think that it is only because we are Peers that we are Conservatives. As a matter of fact, that has nothing to do with it. It's because we—or most of us—have something to lose in the way of money or land. Naturally, if you have a good time as things are, you don't want to change them. It seems to me that if you could only find some way of abolishing the Radicals instead of the Peers, every one would be happy. I am not at all sure that the best way to settle things wouldn't be to go in for payment of Members in the Commons. If you gave them something really handsome—say, a thousand a year each or so—there wouldn't be a Radical among them in three months. They'd all be too anxious to keep what they'd got, instead of making changes; especially if you gave them a retiring pension, in case they got turned out.

What the Radicals don't seem to see is that we are really a very average lot. You can find all sorts among us, just as you can in the opposition shop. There are good and bad Peers, some with brains and some without, some straight and some crooked, though I must admit we haven't got any quite so utterly wrong 'uns as two or three of the Commons Members that I could mention. If you did turn us out and put somebody in our places, however you chose them, you would get very much the same average as you have now. And whatever they might start as, Socialists, or Radicals, or what, they'd soon turn into Conservatives when they found out the possibilities in the way of patronage and influence and perquisites of one kind or another. That, by the way, would be another way of getting rid of the Radicals, giving each of them a title and a few letters to stick after his name, I mean.

I was talking to Jessie about it yesterday, and she says that our best policy is to back up the Suffragettes. She isn't one herself, of course—got far too much sense for that—but her idea is that a woman is always much more Conservative than a man, especially if she is a property owner. She says that if women get votes, on the present property qualification, it will mean putting Conservatives in power for the next half-century, so that the Lords will be quite safe during my lifetime, at any rate. She says it is really going to be a sort of triangular race between the Peers and the Radicals and the Suffragettes—a sort of bumping match. If the Radicals bump us first, they'll abolish us before the Suffragettes can come in and save us. But if the women get the vote before we are abolished, then it will be the Radicals that will get turned out, and we shall be safe. I shouldn't at all wonder if Jessie proved to be right, because she is about the cleverest woman I ever met in my life, and even prettier than she is clever.

THEATRES.

"Three Blind Mice," at the Criterion.

Mr. Arthur Law has done some amusing work, and I was disappointed with the present production. The author of the "Country Mouse" should know all about mice by this time. Certainly, the wisest plans of his three absurdities, the three young men in love with Miss May Palfrey, go as wrong as in the song by Burns. But the whole construction of the piece is so flimsy, there is so little vitality of any sort in it, that one cannot follow their doings with any interest. Obviously, the only attractive man in the play is Mr. Frederick Kerr, the godfather of Miss Palfrey. Though he is older than the young lady by twenty years, we see at once that this barrier will not stand between them, and even the young lady's engagement to Mr. B. O. Clarence, playing the part of an altogether tiresome governess-ridden widower with three children, fails to make one doubt the inevitable end. The governess comes and leads the widower back to the altar. There is a storm in the second act, and the characters come in rather wet from visiting the circus. This remarkable stage device had for effect to damp my rapidly waning interest, and I did not care in the least what had been the relations between Mr. Fred Kerr and the society lady whose part is taken by Miss Granville.

The play is of the ingenuous rather than the ingenious order, and may possibly please among the wooded glades and babbling brooks of the provinces.

"The Cassilis Engagement."

This work was produced by the "Stage Society" at the Imperial Theatre and had the usual run of two performances. It represents the intrigues of a very youthful mother, determined to extricate her son from his engagement to an actress. The environment is throughout that of a country place in Leicestershire. The course pursued by Mrs. Cassilis is the opposite of that taken, as a rule, in real life. Instead of uttering peacock cries of indignation when she hears of the engagement, Mrs. Cossilis quietly accepts the situation and invites Miss Ethel Borridge and her mother to stay with her indefinitely. The rest of the plan, which Mrs. Cassilis develops throughout the four acts of the play, until it is crowned with success, is this: On the one hand, by surrounding her boy with refined ladies, and, in particular, one to whom he has been previously attached, she hopes that the contrast between his betrothed and the others may give him pause. On the other hand, she trusts in the boredom of country life, to weary Miss Ethel Borridge into disgust of her engagement to young Cassilis. This is thoroughly done, and the only unfortunate part of it is that in boring Ethel Borridge, the author ends by boring us also. Still, there are witty remarks to keep awake upon, and the characters of Mrs. Borridge and her daughter were in excellent hands. To the outrageous and, it must be admitted, impossible vulgarity of Mrs. Borridge, Miss Greet brought a talent which characterised so powerfully as almost to make us feel that Mrs. Borridge is real; and Miss Maudi Darrell, whose first attempt I believe this to be in the domain of comedy—without music—showed more than promise, giving to the part of Ethel Borridge a firmness of outline which was very pleasing. Miss Darrell will be heard of again in comedy, or I am much mistaken. Mr. Sam Sothern appeared elegantly as the man of the world, giving counsels of wisdom and revealing the past of Mrs. Borridge, but this part could really have been dispensed with, seeing that Mrs. Cassilis obtains her end without his aid. Mrs. Cassilis, by the way, was not made up to look old enough to be her son's mother.

What struck me throughout the play was that, although produced under the auspices of a society which claims to represent advanced thought and real observation of life, so many of the characters do and say things obviously for effect, and not as the outcome of their temperaments. For instance, the parson is a conventional stage parson, the old aunt is a conventional society aunt, and, above all, the part of Mrs. Borridge is so heavily over-coloured, that one cannot believe the author to have studied from the life. Mr. Hankin has done better work than this, and he should beware lest the desire for popular success lead him into paths where such wit and power of characterisation as are his will be wasted.

The Daily Mail has apparently been giving the wrong date for the "Red Lamp" matinée in aid of St. Mary's Hospital for Women and Children, at Plaistow. This will be given at His Majesty's Theatre, on Thursday, the 28th instant, but so far as one can gather from the announcement, the stalls and balcony stalls have all been sold, but a number of pit stalls have been arranged at the ordinary price of stalls. Viscountess Parker, 22, Down-street, W., is one of those from whom tickets may be obtained.

I was right in my prophesying as regards the success of "Les Merveilleuses," at Daly's. "The Lady Dandies," as the piece is now called, have every right to their success, and on the night of last week when I looked in the house was full from floor to ceiling. Mr. Huntley Wright's appearance and the change of title have acted galvanically upon the performance, and I fancy that Miss Gabrielle Ray has also contributed to this success by her very graceful dancing; and among those who have been in the piece since the beginning, Miss Denise Orme was in particularly good voice the evening I was present, having recovered from the cold which troubled her on the night of Mr. Huntley Wright's first appearance. Dr. Hugo Felix's music is real music, standing well the test of thrice hearing, and shedding over the whole complex performance a sense of dancing lightness, of elegance, and charm.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE PRINCESS CLÉMENTINE.

I READ with sorrow of the death of the good, sagacious, amiable, and very clever and discerning Princess Clémentine, Duchess August of Saxe-Coburg. I speak of her from personal knowledge. I never met an old lady who impressed me more by the qualities of head and heart, ripened by a perfect education and a long and singularly wide and varied experience of life. I first saw her to converse with her in the Hôtel de Liverpool, and then, as Countess Muryani, on the ground floor pied à terre which she had at the Continental. She gave me her views on the future of Bulgaria, speaking English, which she learned at Twickenham before she learned French, and always kept up. She spoke of Bulgaria as a "fine country," emphasising the word "fine," of the people as worthy of every success, and admirable. They were the Scotch of Southern Europe—solid, industrious, and marvellously fit for high civilisation. A better hearted people did not live. They were so generous to herself, she added, crowding on her their beautiful embroidery and other handiwork. The Princess begged of me never to mention her name in connection with Bulgarian affairs. She sent me, after our first conversation, in which I talked through an ear-trumpet, a pretty brooch, arranged as a shamrock, with three large pearls, and having a sapphire centre. The stalk, studded with brilliants, was brought round the shamrock in a circle. The secretary of Prince Ferdinand, M. Bourboulon, brought me this souvenir from the Princess, and said she would in her visits to Paris be happy to receive calls from me. She carried off her deafness with a charming grace. Her handwriting was large, free, and bold, and resembled that of Baroness James de Rothschild, sister of Lady Rothschild.

The Théâtre Français has brought M. Donnay, an up-to-date dramatic author, into the arm-chair at the Academy of M. Albert Sorel, the historian. The left side of that body, as bound to do, has brought the Marquis de Ségur, an agreeable writer on historical subjects, into the arm-chair of Maître Rousse, the eminent advocate. M. Donnay, who received a mathematical training at the Ecole Centrale, but turned out a poor engineer, has had behind him an extremely varied course. There were as many steep up-hill and down deep-dale ways in that course as in, say, a thirty miles' walk in any part of Central America, or round the Peak of Derbyshire. He first worked as a civil engineer in his father's factory, but as he paid more attention to the people around him than to the machinery, the consequences threatened ruin to the business. He had to start out for himself; dropped into "Le Chat Noir;" obtained a hearing there as a poet—genre chansonnier, good-humoured and satirical. Salis gave him much encouragement but no pay. It was against his principles to pay any of his poets. They found a hot-bed for the flowers of fancy and imagination, and fine wit. They, at that time, included Jules Jouy, MacNab, Allais, Delmet, and Auriole. Madness and brain fever lay in wait for most of the bards of Salis, who generally left him for music halls and the press. Donnay contributed to the entertainments of "Le Chat Noir," amongst other things, "Phryné en Ombres Chinoises," with the accompaniment of sparkling verse. He became, at a salary of 50 frs. a week, secretary of the late M. Jacques Saint Cère (pronounced "Sincère") son of a Prussian Jew, and chef in the Royal kitchen at Berlin and Potsdam. Saint Cère ran, when Donnay became his secretary, the blackmailing weekly which one day stranded him en Police Correctionnel. But this was no fault of Donnay's. This born homme de lettres and satirist had opportunities to study in Saint Cère's sumptuous and very open house in the Rue Scribe the motley and feverish society which Panama had called into existence. Some came to adore the lady known as Mme. Jacques Saint Cère, some to see and be seen, some to prepare the way for fishy schemes, others, who had already netted good things in fishy ways, to appease the terrible blackmailer. Donnay wrote the letters, for Jacques' French was that of a foreigner, and he thought better not to let his handwriting appear. Saint Cère outlined answers to communications which he did not always show the secretary. But the latter understood that he should write between the lines, and that a light hand was best to stir a guilty conscience. He saw at Saint Cère's the dramatis personæ of "Retour de Jerusalem," "L'Esclandre," "Paraître," and other plays, and gravitating round the lady of the house ces vieux messieurs whom he pierces with barbed arrows in "Lysistrate." You know perhaps—

> "Plus laide que des prêtres boudhistes
> Ils s'en vont, suivant les modistes,
> Avec des airs astucieux—
> Les vieux messieurs."

You have in London some nice clean old City men who afford a parallel, I am told, to those vieux messieurs. Donnay, luckily for himself, cut the Saint Cère concern before the storm burst on his patron. He found a fairly settled income in writing for Le Temps. But experience soon taught him that to be anything in literature he must throw up journalism, which soon uses up one's gold in the small change of block notes, leaflets (feuillets), or other daily tasks. He is perhaps the most incisive writer of those who graduated at the "Chat Noir," or, indeed, of any dramatic author who has won fame and fortune in the last eighteen years. You may infer from the above that he knows human nature through and through. The factory period of his life enabled him to study Demos, the "Chat Noir" soirées the Bohemian and the slave-driver in the person of Salis. At Saint Cère's he saw the politician-statesman-financist-solemn humbug who rolls in illgotten riches, and the farceur aimable or sceptical who amuses himself or finds money in the weak sides of those who have got on. Donnay does not like Paris except for the liberty it secures to queer types. One may in Paris live according to one's humour more agreeably than elsewhere. This gives to the observer of character illimitable variety in the unity of a brilliant civilisation. With wealth one may be corrupt without risking to be stoned. But when riches have taken wings, it is another story. Timon has then to work. If he can, like Donnay, bring his former flatterers and sycophants into a taking play they will return to him with high interest all his profession gave them.

Donnay is of a roving humour. He lives about six months in the year with his father-in-law in lower Normandy. There he has good fishing and an agreeable country life. He winters at Davos, the Italian lakes, Venice, Naples, the Riviera, and passes about six weeks or at most two months in Paris. This he does to be near the theatres. He is devoted to the Français. The ladies there have paid back his devotion by supporting him with Academicians. Their dressing-rooms may be an ante-chamber to the Academy. Donnay's auto-portrayals in his drama bite into the plate. "Oiseaux de Passage" is from beginning to end in eau forte, with some drops of vitriol that have burnt holes. In "Le Torrent" there are two heroines, and both enigmatic in the same degree; Mmes. Bartet and Brandès personated them. The enigma is: "Laquelle des deux dames a trompé son mari?" I recollect at the first representation some provincial cousins concluding (the play does not conclude) that the deceiver must be Brandès. Bartet could never tromper son mari.

The Japanese war prevented "Retour de Jerusalem" from bringing Donnay about £10,000 in Russia alone. It had only time to come out at the Michel Theatre when the thunderbolt fell on Port Arthur. The Czar received the news of that event as he had just applauded some effect of Mlle. Munti in that play. He had begun the evening at the opera, where "Semiramis" was on, grew tired of its "Orientalisms," and quitted the Empress "to be enlivened by Donnay's anti-Semitic play." Before he left the Winter Palace, early in the evening, he had had a grandiloquent message from Alexeieff, the gist of which was: "Those pigmies burn to strike a blow there (Port Arthur), but they are too clever not to know what it would cost to try. They will never dare. Your Majesty may rest assured that our naval and land forces are in the best fighting trim, and determined to do their duty. This Japan well knows." The war spoilt the theatrical season everywhere in Russia. Donnay only reaped slender royalties. But his "Vieux Messieurs" and "Phryné" had a roaring success at the Musik-Restoration at Irtkousk. Officers under orders for Manchuria made a long halt there, and drank perry costing 20 fr. a bottle for French champagne. Their travelling expenses had been calculated according to the old tariff when there was no transcontinental railway. This gave the poorest a good balance for Musik-Restoration carousals.

Donnay is a Parisian by birth and education, but seems to me half Fleming, half Semite, of the type one sometimes sees in Franz Jourdain's portraits. The strong, long, aquiline nose, heavy jaw protruding, and luscious under lip, remind me of the profile miniature of Philippe le Hardi at the Bibliothèque Nationale. He is related to the Donnay who, in partnership with Cohn, founded the universal provider's at Brussels that was burned down last year, and is fast rising from its ashes.

The Marquis de Ségur belongs to a family of agreeable writers. His great-great-grandfather wrote an agreeable account of his journey with Potemkin in the suite of the Empress Catherine to the Crimea. His great-grandfather wrote agreeable memoirs; his great-grandmother, née Rostopchine, wrote most agreeable stories for children; his aunt, Mlle. de Ségur, wrote agreeable novels and novelettes, and the Marquis himself serves up in agreeably piquant sauce twice-told tales and familiar personages of French history. All the De Ségurs were personally agreeable, and he is no exception. You are not to look in any of them for more than surface sentiment and observation. But they manage to skim cream, and can whip it into nice, tasty froth à la Chantilly. They are, above all things, personally agreeable and clubbable. The Marquis seemed sure of being elected an Academician in the room of Monsignor Perraud. Cardinal Matthieu came forward as a candidate. M. de Ségur at once withdrew. He is very well-bred and unaffected, inclines to the bon enfant type, is plain, but has an interesting countenance, and agreeably intelligent eyes. He gives agreeable dinner parties, keeps a first-rate cook, and if he is vain of anything it is of his cellar. I think it an advantage for men like him to be brought into the Academy. He is under no temptation to blow his own trumpet, has no axe of any consequence to grind, sustains without hurtful pride or other aristocratic nastiness his rank, and has that sociable politeness which goes so far in rendering life pleasant to oneself and those around one.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, being now a Conservatoire professor, is sure of her red ribbon. She may soon expect to triumph over the Council of the Legion of Honour and its Chancellor. Her talents ought to be a sufficient distinction. But this is not her view. She knows that when she retires much will be forgotten because of her decoration. Nor could she endure the idea of Mlle. Bartet wearing the much-coveted croix at soirées when she herself had not so much as the palms of her academy to show. When Sarah Bernhardt quarrelled with M. Perrin (the manager of the Français) in her far-back days, Mlle. Bartet stepped into her place and taught her that there is no necessary actress. On the whole, the new-comer did better than her precursor—her personality was less unbinding. She was, look at her as one might, more plastic, entered more completely into her rôles, was free from mannerism, and her public thought her perfect. I had been very tired of the mannerisms of Sarah Bernhardt, and thought so too. One admires the latter, but sometimes wearies of her. One falls in love with Mlle. Bartet and remains constant to her; her yoke is easy. Sarah is—excuse the fancy—a marvellous transposition of the perpendicular style of architecture. Go to St. Albans Cathedral and sit down in front of the tomb of Duke Humphry of Gloucester, a fancier in his benighted time of rare books and curios. Get the tomb well into your eye, and you will come away with the idea that Sarah Bernhardt in her winding sheet draperies is its only suitable guardian angel. She is like it—all in vertical lines. The vertical style is one of decadence. But it is none the less taking, and has great charm. It is a style meet for the tomb of a grand seigneur, who was a horrible wretch, but had so much charm and was so thoroughly the artist as to win the name of Good Duke Humphry. Mme. Bartet represents the reign of the bourgeoisie which Mme. Récamier began. She finds her symbol in the futilities of the Louis XVI. style of furniture.

Queen Anne is dead! I say this in reference to that eminent and good woman, Mme. Blanc, who took the pseudonym of Bentzon. You will remember that she was née De Solms, coming of an ancient Alsatian family. She belonged to the upper reach of the Seine at Seine Pont, a most characteristic point of the most celebrated valley in Europe, a valley of much sweet dignity, of smiling happiness and wealth, and gladdened with the chasselas vines of Thomery and Fontainebleau. Mme. Bentzen wrote not less agreeable than any De Ségur. Every one admitted to her acquaintance admired and held her in affection. She was genuine in all respects, and in late years of venerable appearance. Her sweet and yet strong face told of the patient fortitude with which she took the inevitable ills of life. M. Briand sent her, last summer, the red ribbon. She said: "It will do to ornament my coffin." So it did. She died a fortnight ago.

My doctor being always willing to test novelties, I sent round to him a dishful. A week later I received from him a cutting from a farmer's journal with an article of his. The subject was: "How to Use Beetroot Leaves as a Substitute for Spinach." The doctor gave it as his medical opinion that these leaves were excellent for the blood on account of the salts of potash and iron they contained, that in many respects they were even preferable to spinach, and that if housekeepers would encourage them there would be an end to the agricultural crisis. The whole article kept this sustained tone of enthusiasm. One little objection he passed over in silence, namely, that the larger leaves are too stringy to be of any use, and the cost of picking out the tender shoots would be prohibitive.

After this, I heard nothing more about beetroot tops. The doctor, however, put by his article, and when, a few weeks ago, his deputy asked him whether he could think of any service he had rendered to French agriculture, he produced several articles on hygiene, agriculture, and cheap food.

"But," he remarked with a smile, "I placed the article on beetroot leaves on top of the pile, so that it might catch the eyes of the Government officials concerned, because I thought it would afford them entertaining reading. So you see I really owe my Mérite Agricole to your dish of mock spinach."

I can quite believe that with careful cultivation beetroot tops might be better than spinach.

On glancing over the New Year's list of honours the other day, I was pleased to find in it the name of my doctor, and not over-surprised at seeing that the particular shape the honour assumed in his case was that of Chevalier du Mérite Agricole—an order of knighthood founded not many years ago by M. Méline, when he was Prime Minister, ostensibly to reward the efforts of farmers and landowners—as if the Méline corn-tax were not sufficient reward—but really to relieve the pressure of candidates on the Legion of Honour.

My doctor is an old Republican, and has rendered services to the party, and several deputies have asked for the red ribbon on his behalf. As the number of ribbons of that colour is not large enough to go round, a cheaper but nevertheless acceptable substitute was offered, and now my doctor's buttonhole proclaims that he has rendered distinguished service to French agriculture. What these services were I had no idea, nevertheless I penned him a line of congratulation. My doctor called on me the other morning to thank me in person, not only for my congratulations, but because I was remotely, he said, the cause of his distinction.

"Guess how?" I gave it up.

"Do you remember the dish of beetroot tops," he queried, "you sent round to me three years ago?"

I thought for a moment, and presently it all came back to my mind. Not only that, but I began to guess how my beetroot tops had led up to the Mérite Agricole. About three years ago, walking out in the country, I met some Flemish farm labourers (who come there on account of the shortage of French labour) rooting up beets for a sugar factory. It occurred to me that the tender leaves might be a good substitute for spinach. These leaves are ploughed in the fields as green manure. I persuaded one of the Flemings to bring me a good basketful. My chief trouble was with my cook, who thought that her dignity was at stake in serving up a thing "fit for cattle." However, I mollified her. The beetroot tops, seasoned with butter, pepper and salt turned out to be very like spinach, with a stronger and slightly astringent—but not unpleasant—flavour.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THERE are three sexes, dear Lady Betty—men, women, and Suffragettes.

ADVICE TO THE AUTHORITIES.

"When taken to be shaken."—Colman the Younger, "Broad Grins."

* * * * *

The country is suffering from two afflictions: lords and ladies.

* * * * *

The narrower the English Channel is the less narrow-minded the English people will be.

* * * * *

London "society" has reduced the Ten Commandments to tabloid form; it is more convenient.

* * * * *

Labour is the political heiress of the time in England; a Tory husband would certainly neglect and deceive her.

* * * * *

Those at the West End urge the rest of the nation to "Think Imperially," but the former should marry Imperially, not Americans; dress Imperially, not in French materials and Paris-made gowns; live Imperially, not half the year partly in the South of France and partly in Germany; eat Imperially, not French-cooked food and French delicacies; drink Imperially, British-brewed ale, not foreign wines; and spend their money Imperially, not mostly on the Continent. The community at large is to "Think Imperially," fast Imperially, and fight Imperially, to enable those in the West End to conduct themselves imperiously!

* * * * *

There is a broad streak of inconsistency that runs right through the British character. The unedifying example of many of the peers furnishes a constantly used argument against the continuance of the House of Lords in its present form. Were the members of that House converted into patterns of good behaviour they would undoubtedly lose much of the attractiveness they possess for most Englishmen, and especially women. It is the element of Don Juanism which is popularly supposed to lurk in almost every peer that makes the pretensions of the peerage tolerable to the ordinary British mind. A privileged few who disregard all but the Upper-Ten Commandments appear to most of our fellow countrymen and women especially worthy of respect. The Angel in the House is generally regarded as a sot. Yet these very people cannot overlook the slightest deviation from the path of rectitude in their social equals or inferiors!

* * * * *

The community in this country might be divided into the misleading and the misled; the Tories, through long practice and the circumstances of their cause, have the instinct of the misleading. "Tariff Reform" implies Liberal progress, but merely means return to Protection; "Municipal Reform" is only opposition to popular control in disguise; "Imperialism" is not single-minded patriotism, but militarism, with all the pecuniary advantages this has for the upper class, sinecures, and the postponement of Progressive legislation. It is singular that a Party which has wasted hundreds of millions recently in South Africa, in useless wars, and advocates a policy which may entail enormous unnecessary expenditure, so carefully scrutinises every penny spent by the people for the people. It is like the Justice of the Peace who drives his motor-car at an illegal speed, and at the risk of maiming or killing others on the road, and presently sentences a poacher to imprisonment for stealing a pheasant! To the objections of the latter he answers, "If the law is unjust, have it altered. I am here to administer it as it stands." The law as regards the speed of motor-cars is established and clear, but he himself disregards it.

The matter of pockets is more serious than it at first sight appears to be. The ordinary man, wearing the ordinary clothing, and the overcoat which is usual in cold weather, possesses fifteen pockets! It is not to be wondered at that he is so continually in a flustered condition. The woman produces her railway or theatre ticket calmly; these are generally either in her purse or in her hand. The ordinary man, on being required to produce the one or the other, has, generally, to hunt through most of the fifteen pockets with a growing suspicion, meanwhile, that the ticket has been lost, and this seriously affects his nervous system. Indeed, for some time before the ticket is required his mind is disturbed by the thought, and he covertly commences the search. It has been calculated that the disturbance of the nervous system of man caused by this circumstance—seeing how frequently in the day he now has to ransack his pockets—continues during several hours! The No-pocket Cure has been devised to remedy that evil.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

SPORTING NOTES.

THE Sportsman appears to have been dangerously excited by my assertion that the moon will fall before betting is in any way recognised by Parliament, and that journal seems to consider that the licensing of bookmakers is quite likely to come about. Any one who is seriously of the opinion that a measure with this object would have the ghost of the shadow of a chance of passing through either House of Parliament must be the stupidest and most ignorant of two-legged creatures. It seems inconceivable that any one suffered to go at large can print such balderdash. Surely a lesson might be learnt, even by the Sportsman, from the Parliamentary history of the Street Betting Act, and the acquiescence in that measure of the numerous members of the Jockey Club who sit in the House of Lords, while in the House of Commons Lord Stanley, who is a Steward of the Club, had not a word to say in opposition to it. Racing can go on very well without popular betting, which, as Lord Beaconsfield wrote in 1880, "brings the gaming-table into the street, and converts the Turf into a vast engine of national demoralisation." The absurdities and fatuities of the Sportsman and some other journals remind me of the remark of a well-known Peer, who was for many years a prominent member of the Jockey Club, and a leading owner of race horses. Somebody happened to mention the announcement that a certain journal was "written by gentlemen for gentlemen," whereupon Lord X. observed, "It might be said of most of the sporting papers that they are written by noodles for doodles." He would have been confirmed in this opinion if he had lived to read the piteous and distracted brayings of screeching addleheads during the last two months.

Last week, in referring to the racing career of Lord Hastings' mare, Lady Elizabeth, I wrote exactly the reverse of what I had proposed by a temporary eclipse of memory. I had intended to say that, after losing £20,000 by the defeat of Lady Elizabeth in the Middle Park Plate, Lord Hastings recovered the money when she won her match with Julius. It was a slashing race, and the mare was never worth sixpence afterwards, although the tactics of those clever but not too scrupulous persons who were behind the scenes were so ably conceived and carried out that she started favourite for the Derby, the real odds against her being at least 10,000 to 1. Several persons made respectable fortunes by laying steadily against Lady Elizabeth, and they had no reason to fear the issue of these transactions, as they knew perfectly well that the mare had gone all to pieces, and would be incapable of winning a donkey race. The cackling about Lady Elizabeth having been poisoned was all wretched drivel. Lord Hastings would probably have won the Derby of 1868 with The Earl if that horse had been allowed to start, but he was scratched at the last moment, and Admiral Rous then wrote his famous letter to the Times on the story of the spider and the fly.

I hear that since Persimmon went to the stud he has earned £112,000 in fees. A foreign offer of 50,000 gs. for the King's horse was refused some time ago. Persimmon headed the list of winning sires for 1906, thanks to Keystone II., who credited him with £12,837. Plum Tree and Gourd contributed nearly £5,000 towards their sire's total, which would have been increased by £4,275 if Keystone II. had won the St. Leger, and subsequent running clearly proved that she ought to have been the winner at Doncaster. Persimmon's prospect for next season is not bright, as Keystone II. has very few engagements in weight-for-age stakes, and she will, of course, be over-weighted in handicaps. Gourd may win another good handicap on soft ground, and Plum Tree is a genuine stayer, but only a moderate horse, so he will need to be judiciously placed. Persimmon will have to depend mainly on his two-year-olds, for his three-year-olds in England are a very poor lot. The King's dark colt Perambulator may do good service for his sire if he turns out to be smart, but at present nothing is known about him. Then there is M. E. Blanc's Ouadi Halfa, who was certainly one of the best two-year-olds in France last season, and he is said to have wintered well. Two dark fillies which are likely to turn out useful are his Majesty's Isograph and Lord Rosebery's Prunella.

Malua is a horse that is likely to win an important handicap next season, but it is certainly nonsensical to eulogise his running in the Cambridgeshire, which is apparently considered to be a strong recommendation by one of the sporting papers. In that race Polymelus gave Malua 3 lb. more than weight for age, and Mr. Joel's horse won in a common canter, having at least a stone in hand. There is nothing at all impressive about such form, but it is probable that Malua will be found to have come on considerably during the winter, as he was palpably backward and unfurnished as a three-year-old, and he is said to have been doing well. The Royal Hunt Cup is the race which would just suit Malua, and I do not expect we shall see Mr. Faber's horse out during the spring.

Meadow Rue is much fancied by many good judges for the Kempton Park Jubilee Handicap. This filly had been twice beaten at Newmarket (in May and in July), when running in good company, before she was started for a selling race, value £100, at the Derby September Meeting. She won very easily, and Mr. D. Baird allowed her to go at 500 gs., the filly having been entered to be sold for £50, and she was purchased by Mr. W. Clark. Meadow Rue was apparently regarded as exceedingly moderate by her former stable, as she started at 10 to 1 for this race, Golden Lassie colt (who finished second) being a great "pot" at 6 to 5. Mr. Clark put Meadow Rue aside until the autumn, considering that she was the sort of animal to do well in nurseries, and his policy turned out to be sound. At the Newmarket Houghton Meeting this filly won the Richmond Nursery, starting favourite at 2 to 1, and at Liverpool she carried off the Knowsley Nursery, with 12 lb. extra, and her friends were not frightened by the penalty, as she again started favourite at 9 to 4. Meadow Rue afterwards finished third to Hillsprite and the Ardvourlie filly for the Chesterfield Nursery at Derby, and she was giving 13 lb. to the winner, including the sex allowance. The filly's autumn performances give a timely lift to her sire, Sainfoin, who already had one of the very best two-year-olds of the season (Sagamore) running for him. If Meadow Rue was sold at Derby with her engagements she has a fair prospect of winning the Column Produce Stakes at the Newmarket Craven Meeting, and she was entered by her breeder for the Yearling Plate of £1,000 at the Hurst Park Whitsuntide Meeting. She was struck out of her other engagements when a yearling, one of them having been the Great Foal Stakes at Newmarket.

A fortnight ago I stated that M. E. Blanc is believed to own a very promising dark three-year-old in Vichy. I have since read a dissertation on the Derby, in which Vichy is mentioned as a likely second string for his owner at Epsom in case he should decide to reserve Ouadi Halfa for his French engagements. Vichy is not entered for the Derby, and he never was engaged in that race. Last year he had three English engagements the Coventry Stakes and the New Stakes at Ascot, and the Middle Park Plate, but he never started as a two-year-old. His only remaining engagement in England is the Two Thousand. Ouadi Halfa has been backed for the Derby at the ridiculous price of 12 to 1. Anyone must be hopelessly crackbrained who backs this horse without stipulating for a start. It would be better business to take 4 to 1 with a start than 12 to 1 all in. If Ouadi Halfa turns out to be his owner's best three-year-old he is quite certain to start for the Prix du Jockey Club (French Derby), which is run at Chantilly on the Sunday in Epsom week, and a horse which has started in France on Sunday cannot reasonably be expected to run up to his best form in England three days later. It is curious that M. Blanc should have struck this colt out of the Eclipse Stakes when the first minor forfeit for the foals engaged was declared in October, 1905, and six months earlier Troutbeck had been withdrawn.

The Royal Handicap Steeplechase at Windsor on Thursday was won by Red Lad, who finished second to Ascetic's Silver for last year's Grand National Steeplechase. Red Lad was not backed as if he was considered to be one of Mr. Hibbert's good things, as the horse was extremely backward, and his performance, under the circumstances, was a most creditable one. After his race at Aintree last March he was believed to be unsound, and next day he was put up for sale by auction, when Mr. Hibbert purchased him for 1,050 gs. Red Lad is now sound enough, and he ought to train on to a very considerable extent during the next month if the going is good. Last year he jumped the Aintree country without making a mistake, and he ought to be a very dangerous candidate for the Grand National with 11 st. 3 lb. on his back.

His Majesty's horse Flaxman was beaten at Baldoyle last week, and I do not believe that he has any real chance of winning the Grand National. Flaxman is a fine horse and a good fencer, but it may any day be necessary to stop him in his work, and nobody ought to back him for the Grand National until his number is up. He is more likely to win the Grand Military Gold Cup at Sandown Park next week.

I hear that Lord Derby will probably be represented by Bridge of Canny in the Liverpool Spring Cup. This horse does not require a strong preparation, and he will be fit enough by March 23. Bridge of Canny is well in for this handicap with 8 st. 6 lb., considering the moderate class of his probable opponents. Lord Derby's horse has two nice weight-for-age engagements—in the Newmarket Triennial at the Craven Meeting and the Ascot Triennial.

Lord Derby will probably be represented in the Union Jack Stakes of £1,200, on the first day at Liverpool, by Glacis, by Carbine out of Glasalt, who will be entitled to an allowance of 7 lb. Glacis was backward when he ran at Kempton Park and at York last summer, and he is said to have made a considerable improvement during the winter. Lord Derby has also accepted for the Union Jack Stakes with Boulter's Lock, half-brother, by St. Frusquin, to Keystone II., but he may reserve this colt for the Bickerstaffe Stakes of £700 on the second day at Aintree. Boulter's Lock is also said to have "come on" in a satisfactory manner since he was last seen out at the Liverpool Autumn Meeting in November.

Twelve months ago nobody entertained any idea that Lord Derby would win the Oaks and the Coronation Stakes. It is quite likely that his colours may again be very prominent in the fillies' races, as he has two highly promising candidates for those events in the "dark" Ste. Claire II., by Isinglass out of Santa Brigada (dam of Bridge of Canny), and Altitude, by Florizel II. out of Alt Mark. Ste. Claire II. was not trained for her two-year-old engagements, but Altitude was highly tried before the York August meeting, where she started favourite for the Prince of Wales's Plate, but could only get third, the winner being Saxham, who was giving her 18 lb., while she had 8 lb. the best of the weights with Hexagon, who finished second. This was a miserable exhibition. A few weeks later Altitude was again heavily backed for the Kempton Park Nursery, but again finished third, the winner being Galleot, who was carrying the same weight as Lord Derby's filly, while she was giving 9 lb. to Clareton, who was placed second. Altitude's last appearance as a two-year-old was in the Cheveley Park Stakes at the Newmarket Second October Meeting, when she was again strongly supported, but was beaten by Witch Elm, who was giving her 5 lb. These fillies are engaged in the One Thousand, Oaks, Coronation Stakes, and St. Leger.

A non-sporting paper, referring to the plunging of Lord Hastings, states that the only survivor of the racing magnates of that era is Mr. Henry Chaplin, who has long ago given up the Turf. The writer has forgotten Sir Frederick Johnstone, who was a bold and very successful plunger, as he never put down his money unless there was a good reason for doing so. When the late Lord Alington (then Mr. Sturt) and Sir Frederick backed a horse in earnest they were excellent men to follow. One of their greatest coups would have been the Cambridgeshire of 1871, as if Allbrook had been judiciously ridden he would have walked in for that race. Sir Reginald Graham sometimes betted heavily in those days, and another survivor is Lord Coventry, who, however, was always most cautious in his Turf transactions, and he never lost any considerable sum of money at racing.

Mr. Joel's colt Earlston, by Love Wisely out of Monday, was highly tried last spring before he made a successful début at Derby, and his autumn form was more than respectable. Earlston will be specially prepared for the Chester Vase of £2,100, and he should have a fair chance of winning that race if he can stay the course, for it is thought that he will be more distinguished for speed than for stamina. The Duke of Westminster's Dusty Miller, who is expected to turn out a very useful three-year-old, will be dangerous in this race, for which I hear he is to be reserved, and Earlston will have to give him 2 lb. The individual who drew out the conditions of this race committed a serious blunder when he omitted any penalties for two-year-old winners. Black Arrow is engaged, and his 12 lb. penalty for winning a race at Lingfield of the value of over £2,000 is reduced to 5 lb. by a breeding allowance.

His Majesty's horse Nulli Secundus is said to be now in excellent form, and he is so well weighted for the Imperial Hurdle Race at Sandown Park that he may be reserved for that event, instead of being started for the £500 race at Newbury on Friday, as was originally intended. This event will probably be won by Cinders. The Imperial Hurdle Race is a stake of £1,000, and it is run on Saturday, March 2. Wild Aster and Cinders are the top weights, each having 12 st. 10 lb. to carry, and then comes John M.P. with 12 st. 9 lb. Nulli Secundus is thrown in with 10 st. 3 lb.

Next spring, at the close of the hind hunting, the Quantock Staghounds will be given up. Mr. E. A. V. Stanley, who has hunted this pack for six seasons, has accepted the mastership of the Devon and Somerset Staghounds. In future the Devon and Somerset pack will pay periodical visits to the Quantock district, as well as hunting the Exmoor country. This is the arrangement which was formerly in force before Mr. Stanley's pack was established.

Last week I had occasion to comment on an extraordinary attack that Mr. J. E. Gardiner, the Devonshire County hockey player, had made on the Somerset team. I am very glad indeed to see that he has had the good sense to made a very frank apology. He asks that it may be accepted in the spirit in which it is made, and I feel sure that Somerset and other players will accept his regrets. It is an old saying that a still tongue maketh a wise head, and but for this apology it might have been written that a pen does more harm than a hockey stick.

Dr. Warre, the old Headmaster of Eton, last week addressed a meeting of Oxford University boat captains on coaching. It was the fiftieth anniversary of the day on which he had first rowed for Oxford. His lecture was full of good advice. My only regret is that he did not give it at the Union. Every rowing man at the University would then have attended, and learned something. The boat captain of the future, the freshman of this year, could then have been present. I wonder if the president of the C.U.B.C. could get the lecturer to go to Cambridge.

The Amateur Rowing Association has had the question of amateurs' expenses forced upon it by the approaching Olympic Games, which for some reason or other are to include boat racing. At Henley no crew can have its expenses paid except by the members of the club that it represents. That is where the Vesper Club, from Philadelphia, fell foul, in one respect, at least, with the authorities. The sub-committee has proposed a rule which the Association will be invited to pass as a law. The rule seems to cover the ground, but in order to avoid any doubts, I should like to suggest an amendment. The proposition is that "an amateur may not receive any contribution towards his expenses in competing in a race or a regatta except from the club which he represents or from a bonâ-fide member of such club, but the committee shall have power to make special rules for any international regatta or competition." The reservation is a very proper one. Now as to the amendment that I propose. It will be observed that the proviso as to expenses only applies to the amateur competing in a race. It might well be argued that it does not apply to the oarsman who trains, but owing to accident or ill-health fails to compete, or whose crew for some reason or other has to scratch. Nor would the rule cover the case of the spare men, those unfortunate twin brethren in misfortune, who year after year go to Putney and just miss the Blue. They never compete in the race. I would therefore submit to the committee of the A.R.A. that before the rule is finally submitted the words "in training for" should be inserted after the word expenses.

The rule would then run, "his expenses in training for or in competing in." This alteration I regard as being most material. There is then another question which does not seem to have occurred to those who framed the proposed rule, and that is the question of time. The rule, as I have said, is obviously intended to include training expenses, but there is no limit of time. Now there are certain folk who at times compete at Henley who are so keen on winning certain of the prizes that they are quite capable of finding wealthy supporters who would practically keep a crew or a sculler for months at their expense in order to carry a trophy on a trans-Atlantic journey. I believe that the University crew goes into strict training six weeks before the race, and I would therefore limit the period of expenses to that period, reserving to the committee the power to sanction any exceptional expenses incurred owing to temporary and unforeseen circumstances. As an example, I would recall the fact that Cambridge had to journey to Richmond owing to the frozen state of the Cam. Of course, it is very easy to criticise and suggest amendments when one reads a rule which has obviously been very carefully drafted. But I do think that the two points I have raised require very careful attention, especially having regard to the various competitors from all the world over who come to seek rowing honours in this country. To some of them the letter of the law is everything and the spirit thereof nothing. Some degree of precision is therefore desirable. Such precision helps also as a guide to the committee in regulating what it conceives to be the proper expenses that should be permitted in international contests. For instance, the crew we hope to see one day from Australia would be on a very different footing to one from Paris, Toronto, or Philadelphia.

The Oxford crew have left the University and gone to Henley. The crew is, I am told, coming on satisfactorily. At present the body recovery is not smart, and so to make up time they rush the slides forward, with the inevitable consequence that they do not get their weight on at the beginning of the stroke. Since Johnston went six the Cambridge crew has improved rapidly. He backs up stroke splendidly. At the same time there is a tendency to lie too far back at the end of the stroke. The crew has a good beginning. They have done some fast work, and should become a first-class crew.

The University sports are fixed for the Friday after the boatrace. I hope that the new A.A.A. rule as to the hammer will be adopted. The hammer has to have a straight steel shaft with a wooden grip. The American clutches are done away with. At Cambridge Brass did a very good sprint considering the ground in the Trinity sports, and at Oxford Chavasse ran very well in the Jesus open quarter, although he failed to win. Rogers, the winner, is no plater.

When Lord Randolph Churchill forgot Mr. Goschen he learned that no man is indispensable. Judging by the remarks of the writers on Association football it would seem that they, too, have to learn the lesson that Mr. Clegg is not indispensable. His supporters, however, are those who in conjunction with their legislative duties on the Football Association carry out journalistic work. Naturally, they are prepared to support their ex-chairman through thick and thin, and regard him as being indispensable. In March, 1905, the Council carried a resolution compelling local associations to conform to their wishes as to whom they should and should not admit to their bodies. To accede would in many cases involve a change in the rules. Many on the Council considered—and I agree with them—that under the rules of the Football Association the Council had no power to pass such a resolution. They further argued that even if they had such power it was coercive, and it was undesirable to exercise it. Mr. Clegg says that the objectionable resolution was in accordance with the practice of the Council, and he so strongly resents the rescission which was recently passed at the Council meeting that he resigns the chairmanship. Mr. Sherrington, the vice-president of the Association, points out the contentions on behalf of the original opponents to which I have referred. He says the famous fall-into-line resolution thoroughly shook the confidence of the amateur clubs in the Council. How correct he is in his opinion is shown by the fact that the committee of amateur clubs formed in November last to deal with the requisitions for a special general meeting of the F.A. recommend that final fixtures for next year be held over until negotiations are completed. They hope and trust the final settlement will be amiable and final. Now, Mr. Clegg and his friends seem to regard amateurs as poor creatures who clamour for gate-money and expenses. They do not hesitate to ridicule them at the expense of the professionals. They fail to realise that the amateur has no objection to the professional player. That player has no representation, and cannot sit on the Council. His wages and his transfers are all arranged by the Council, which fixes the terms and times at which he may be bought and sold. To men like Mr. Clegg it must be very annoying that the amateur, or non-paid player, declines to be dragooned in this way. I agree that the resolution was in accordance with the practice of a certain section of the Council, who seemed to consider themselves to be the heaven-sent tyrants of the game, and the omniscient embodiments of despotic wisdom. It is a matter for supreme satisfaction that the leader of this policy has seen fit to retire. The prospects of a deplorable split are considerably lessened. The world will still go round the sun, and the finals of the Football Association Cup and of the Amateur Cup will still be played. Mr. Clegg is not indispensable. His policy is dispensable. The popularity of the game as a sport and recreation depends upon the existence of the non-paid player. They are the huge majority of the active players, and it is to their welfare that the attention of the Association should be primarily directed.

Blackheath, with an Irish international and military contingent, beat Cambridge University very easily. They need scarcely be puffed up with pride, for no one takes much account of these University matches at the fag end of the season. Richmond went under very badly to the London Scottish, and the Old Merchant Taylors had to be content with a drawn game against Lennox.

It may have been that Woolwich Arsenal were temporarily upset by their local earthquake. At all events, they showed anything but really first-class form in their home match against Bristol City. The visitors thoroughly deserved their win, and they may now head them in the League table. The Chelsea team increased their chances of promotion by beating Lincoln City away from home. In the Amateur Cup ties the Clapton team scored a victory over Oxford City, whom they overplayed forward. Before very long Ireland will score a win against England under Association rules. At Liverpool they were only beaten by a goal. Portsmouth were beaten by Fulham in the Southern League, and so the teams changed places in the League table. But Portsmouth are only a point behind, and have two more matches to play.

Mr. Henry Leach's book, "Great Golfers in the Making" (Methuen and Co., 7s. 6d. net), will delight every lover of the game. Thirty-four famous players, amateur and professional, contribute chapters relating the story of their golf, how they learned the game, corrected their faults, surmounted difficulties, and eventually acquired the degree of skill which has made practically every one of them the winner of a championship. Perhaps the principal lesson to be drawn from their experiences is that in golf as in other games, an infinite capacity for taking pains is essential if any considerable success is to be achieved. But the book is full of hints that may be useful to the player desirous of improving his game, while, apart from its educational value, it is thoroughly interesting as a collection of golfing autobiographies.

It is very hard lines on R. L. Baker to have come from Australia to take part in the middle-weight boxing competition and then in less than a fortnight to be laid up with enteric. If sympathy in misfortune can comfort, he has it.

Stock Markets More Active—But Business Unevenly Distributed—New High Records for Trunks and Tintos—The Canadian Pacific's Fine Half-Yearly Statement—Americans Better though the Market still Distrusted—Domestic Securities Depressed—Dear Money the Principal Influence.

WHILE business in the Stock Exchange, generally speaking, still gives rise to complaints, the House during the past week developed a moderate amount of activity in one or two sections. Canadian Rails and Copper shares have shown to considerable advantage, new high-level records being established for Trunk Thirds and Tintos, while Mexican Rails have risen to the highest figures touched for many years, the movement being associated with a report that the Mexican Government is buying for control. The rise in Canadian Railway issues was fully explained by the half-yearly dividends just announced. Canadian Pacifics have since the beginning of the half-year been rather roughly handled, owing to the existence of an unwieldy "bull" account and the spell of bad weather experienced in the North-West. The half-yearly figures, therefore, showing, as they did, net earnings on the railway alone of over 16 per cent. per annum for the six months, came as a welcome antidote to the recent depression, and have already been responsible in rallying the shares to the extent of several dollars. Grand Trunks during the early part of the week were heavily bought; prices subsequently were inclined to waver a little on reports that the Company would shortly issue more Guaranteed stock. This is more than a remote possibility, and while it need not seriously disturb the equanimity of the "bulls" of "Thirds," it lends additional point to the remarks I made last week about the distance that separates the Ordinary from the dividend stage. Americans, helped by the satisfactory dividend announcements of the Union and Southern Pacific Boards, and by "bullish" estimates of the prospects for Missouri Kansas and United States Steel shares, have made a further recovery, though movements, apart from the shares mentioned, did not amount to very much. The market has again derived useful assistance from the "bear" division, but the public in America remains shy, and with the Railroad and other leading Corporations all wanting to raise money, and having to offer unusually stiff rates for their accommodation, the task of raising values of existing stocks is hardly becoming easier. The Home Railway market, instead of showing symptoms of recovery, goes from bad to worse. The recent run of poor traffics appears to have rather badly scared holders of Brighton Deferred, and the price has tumbled to within a point or two of par, the selling pressure meeting with practically no resistance. North British Deferred also suffered a bad break. The fall appeared to be due in part to the difficulties of an operator in Glasgow, who had been caught a "bear" of Tintos and a "bull" of British, though the coming dividend was also believed to have something to do with the slump, speculators in the North evidently taking a serious view of the loss incurred in connection with the recent Arbroath disaster, not to mention the expense arising from the snowed-up condition of the line during the closing weeks of the half-year. Speaking of investment securities generally, the dearness of money is still the main influence at work upon prices. A good deal has been said since the King's Speech about possible adverse legislation affecting stock values, but while admittedly the Stock Exchange is still somewhat exercised over the demands of the Labour Party in the House of Commons, prices, in my estimation, are being kept down far more by high interest rates than by lack of confidence in the political outlook. At the present time the London Money Market is being called upon, not only to cope with a growing internal demand for currency, but to give substantial assistance to foreign borrowers. The tide of American short term note issues is still flowing strongly, and the capital issues being placed here by Argentine Railways come as a good second. In both cases British investors are getting excellent security and a comparatively generous return on their capital. From that point of view there is no reason to feel aught but gratification, but meanwhile the extension of credits allowed involves the possibility of further gold exports, and thus the likelihood of really easier money—which must be inaugurated before any lasting revival can take place in gilt-edged securities—is being postponed. The Miscellaneous market last week provided a sensation in the severe slump that occurred in Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred. The fall, which led to the downfall of two small jobbers, excited considerable comment in the House, and it was common gossip that the break was the outcome of the tactics pursued by the member of a "bull" syndicate who had "ratted" upon his fellows.

Home Rails and the Reasons for their Unpopularity—Has the Fall been Overdone?—Prospects and Yields Analysed—The Fall in North British—Adverse Dividend Forecasts.

The Home Railway market during the past week failed to show any signs of returning animation, and for the most part prices continued to dwindle. Even the deduction of the dividends from prices—a matter that in former times of speculative activity used invariably to attract a little attention on the theory that stocks looked cheap—was allowed to pass unnoticed. That the Home Railway market has lost its old popularity with the public is, perhaps, not to be wondered at in view of the fact that for a decade past holders have been treated to a continuous spectacle of shrinking prices, and in some cases to severe "cuts" in dividends. What with the effects upon the money market of two great wars; the havoc wrought upon the receipts of our railways by motor and tramway competition; the growth in rates and taxes; the fears of Socialistic legislation; and last, but by no means least, the rival attractions offered by Canadian and Foreign Railway stocks—as a result of the great forward movement that has occurred in the New World—the Home Railway market has never been given a chance to hold up its head. The influences I have mentioned are sufficient, without referring to the lack of enterprise shown by the dealers themselves in sticking to obsolete and almost prohibitive methods of contangoing stocks. While admitting, however, the natural prejudice that has been fostered against Home Rails, it becomes a question whether the fall in values is not in danger of being overdone. So far the market has almost ignored the great revival that commenced in the general trade of the country some eighteen months ago, though the improvement has already been reflected to a pronounced extent upon the earnings of the leading goods and mineral carrying lines. Dividends have not perhaps been increased to the extent some people had hoped, but this circumstance is encouraging rather than otherwise, for it implies an effort on the part of the Boards to equalise dividends by taking advantage of good times to strengthen reserves, and to increase the amounts spent upon their properties. Another point that should be kept in mind is the growing tendency to closer co-operation amongst the Companies, with a view to abolishing unnecessary competition, and the successful attempts that have lately been made to economise by more scientific methods of handling traffic. Again, with one or two exceptions, the Companies have, during the last few years, pursued a much more moderate policy in the matter of capital expenditure, and though retrenchment did not occur before it was badly needed, and may not have come at all but for the stringency prevailing in the money market, the fact, with the others I have just alluded to, is worth keeping in mind. Coming to the question of actual and prospective yields, which is, after all, the primary one for investors, there is much to inspire a feeling of confidence in the market outlook. The dividend season, now just ended, has made some important revisions in the returns upon stocks, and I have therefore thought it opportune to set out the distributions for the last two half-years, and show the yields at current values. For comparative purposes I have also included the dividends paid in respect of 1905:—

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

Judged by all past records it would be said at once that stocks are now selling at tempting levels. Even making allowance for the adverse factors that have come into play within recent years, a yield of £4 6s. upon London and North-Western Ordinary (the Consols of the Railway market) seems to leave room for some levelling up in price, and it will be surprising if the present depression in this and other "Heavy" stocks is allowed to remain when monetary conditions sensibly improve, as it is to be hoped they will a little later on. Hull and Barnsley should be worth buying on the basis of a 4⅝ per cent. return, for the Company appears to be in for another prosperous year, judging by the outlook in the coal trade. Already for six weeks it has put up a gross increase of £7,200. The Company proposes to place shortly £300,000 of new Preference stock, which, assuming it be a 3½ per cent. issue, would require another £10,500 net revenue. Providing, however, that traffics keep up at anything like their present rate, the line should be able not only to meet this extra charge, but after providing for increased revenue expenditure to be in a position to make a small increase in its Ordinary dividend. The high yields obtainable on the southern passenger and underground lines are less surprising, in view of the great increase of competition caused in the last two or three years through the development of tube, tramway, and motor enterprise. Still, when South-Eastern Preferred can be bought to return 4⅝ per cent., City and South London Ordinary to pay 4¾ per cent., and North London Ordinary to give 5¼ per cent., it looks as if the market had already discounted pretty fully the adverse features of the situation. The current level of prices and how they compare with the highest and lowest of last year may be gathered from the following table:—

Among Scottish Rails it will be observed that North British have suffered a sharp break. This was connected by some people with the financial troubles of a Glasgow operator, though adverse dividend estimates also appear to have had some bearing upon the movement. The Company paid 2 per cent. in respect of the second half of 1905, and although traffic returns in the six months just completed showed an increase of £30,000 it is expected that the Board will have to reduce the dividend, in view of the accident claims arising out of the Arbroath disaster, and the addition to working expenditure entailed by the "snowed up" condition of the line in the last few weeks of the half-year. Dealers in London have been recently talking of 1½-¾, but operators in the North are pitching their estimate lower still, 1 to 1½ per cent. having been suggested in some quarters. Assuming the dividend be reduced from 2 to 1½ per cent., it would mean that the available balance was some £30,000 less than a year ago, despite the published traffic gain already referred to of £30,000.

Further Rally in Americans—Bears Restive but Public Buying Still Small—The Pacific Dividends—Bulls Talk Regarding Missouri Kansas—Steels and Dividend Rumours—Currency Reform—The General Outlook.

A further recovery has occurred in American Rails during the past week. On one occasion the volume of shares changing hands in Wall-street exceeded 1,000,000. It cannot be said, however, that there was any notable increase in the amount of public buying, a matter which appears to have given a good deal of disappointment to the professionals. Covering purchases by the "bear" party doubtless again had much to do with the rally, operators for the fall being rendered nervous by the aggressive support given to one or two stocks. The movements in the majority of shares were

The Pacific stocks have been most prominent owing to the declaration of the half-yearly dividends. No one will deny the phenomenal prosperity that has, during the last few years, been enjoyed by the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific, and the fact that a second half-yearly distribution of 5 per cent. is being made upon the former stock, and that the 10 per cent. paid last autumn is being repeated in the case of the Union Pacific, caused little surprise. To some speculators, indeed, the declarations were a disappointment, as 6 per cent. had been freely predicted upon Southern Pacifics, and it was whispered that the Union Pacific might even pay a bonus in addition to its 10 per cent. dividend. Missouri, Kansas, and Texas shares have met with very liberal support from New York. There has been less talk lately about a guarantee, the belief now most commonly entertained being that the Company will pay an initial dividend of 1 per cent. immediately, and another 1 per cent. in the autumn. Some very bullish estimates of the Company's prospects have lately been published. In the view of one authority the road should earn in the current year a surplus for dividends ranging from 3½ to 4 million dollars, which would mean from 5½ to 7 per cent. for the Common stock. Another stock that has changed hands in very large amounts lately is United States Steel Common. The Morgan following is credited with having been large buyers of call options on Steels for some time, and Mr. J. P. Morgan is said to be in favour of an advance in the dividend in April. Apart from these specialties the market has not presented any particularly striking feature, and the narrowness of the fluctuations suggests that the support given by the "bear" party has been made free use of to distribute stock. For several days it was noticeable that prices after opening strongly in London fell away rapidly in the late dealings. This looked like a revival of the trick so often played with success by Wall-street, whereby the London market was rigged overnight in order to allow New York to work off an accumulation of selling orders. A good deal of talk has been indulged in over the alleged modification in the Government's attitude towards the Railroad and other large capitalist interests, and it is believed in some quarters that President Roosevelt will shortly take steps to define his position, with the view of replying to the attacks that have been made against him by his political opponents. Whether, however, the Railroad managers will find the way smoothed for them to advance freight rates as suggested is questionable. Some people have already begun to count upon such a step, though according to statements alleged to have come from representatives of the Standard Oil group, higher tariffs are unlikely yet awhile, the view adopted by leading managers being that with the President in a more conciliatory frame of mind anything calculated to revive hostility would be bad policy. Certainly nothing would be more likely to inflame public opinion against the railroads than an advance in rates, and as evidence of the popular outcry that still exists one may point to the legislation threatened in the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, which, if adopted, would have the effect of reducing gross earnings without reference to the present tendency of working costs to increase. The market is perhaps on more solid ground in hoping for some measure of currency reform that will give greater elasticity to the system of note circulation. The Aldrich Bill now under discussion, if made law, would permit of Customs receipts being deposited in the banks instead of being consigned to the vaults of the Treasury Department, whence they can only be released into circulation by means of appropriations by Congress. Under the proposed plan the banks would be able to retire three times the volume of circulation that is now allowed. For the present, however, the market is still demonstrating, by the issue of short-dated notes at high rates of interest how severely its available resources are being strained, and this fact, coupled with the big rise in railway working expenses and the public's distrust of the "bosses"—which is likely to be intensified by the further disclosures that will be made at the resumed hearing of the case against the Harriman group set down for the 25th inst.—makes it difficult to see how Wall Street can hope to do more than temporarily raise prices. Among the recent new issues one that is of some general public interest was the offer of $1,500,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Fifty Year bonds on behalf of the contractors for the building of the Kansas City, Mexico, and Orient Railway Company. The price of issue was par, say, £205 15s. for the $1,000 bonds, and with each bond will be given by way of bonus $300 Non-cumulative Four per Cent. Preferred stock, and $300 Common stock of the railway. The bonds are secured on the property, assets, and franchises of the Railway Company, which include the railroad within the States of Kansas and Oklahoma, the bonds and stock of the Texas Corporation, in whom the ownership of the railroad within that State is legally vested, and the bonds issued under a mortgage executed in Mexico, and charging the railroad within that Republic. The railroad, when completed, will extend from Kansas City, Missouri, to Topolobampo Bay, Mexico, a distance of about 1,629 miles, and will be shorter by nearly 500 miles than any other railroad route between Kansas City and the Pacific coast.

The Canadian Pacific's Half-yearly Statement — Over 16 per Cent. Earned by the Railway Alone—Improved Weather Conditions—Heavy Buying of Grand Trunks—Rumoured Forthcoming issue of Guaranteed Stock—More Argentine Railway Capital Asked for—Stockholders Protest Against Underwriting.

The strength shown by Canadian Rails was one of the leading features in the Stock Exchange last week. Canadian Pacific, after its recent slump, scored a sharp recovery, for which there were several contributory causes. In the first place, the unwieldy "bull" account that had been built up has lately undergone a wholesome shrinkage, and the "bulls" were able at the carry-over last week to obtain accommodation on comparatively easy terms. Then again, reports were received from the Canadian North-West to the effect that the severe snowstorms had abated, and that general conditions on the railroads were rapidly righting themselves. The continued recovery in the American market also helped not a little to put more heart into Canadas, but the principal lever which raised the shares was the dividend announcement made in respect of the half-year to December 31. The actual rates to be distributed on April 2, namely, 3 per cent. from railway earnings and ½ per cent. from interest upon the proceeds of the land sales, was just in accordance with expectations; being an interim distribution, nobody had looked for more than the usual 3 per cent. out of railway revenue, while the ½ per cent. bonus paid out of lands income (which is to be repeated in the autumn) had been foreshadowed by the chairman at the meeting last October. What, however, gave such gratification to the market was the surplus carried forward of $6,600,000. This amount is $1,730,000 larger than the surplus balance of a year ago, notwithstanding that in the past half-year $20,280,000 of new Common stock allotted in April last ranked for full dividend, increasing the distribution by over $600,000. The surplus alone is equal to more than 5 per cent. actual on Canadian Pacific Common, so that the earnings from the railway last half-year, without making any allowance for the revenue from lands, was equivalent to more than 16 per cent. per annum. It may be recalled that the net earnings for the completed year ended June 30, 1906, worked out at 14 per cent. on the capital then ranking. The advance in the balance available, in spite of the big increase of capital, is very satisfactory, particularly when it is borne in mind that a large portion of the money raised last spring has never yet had a chance of assisting traffic receipts, for the simple reason that it has not yet been spent. As Sir Thomas Shaughnessy recently said, the Board would willingly spend $10,000,000 on equipment if it could only get the equipment; but not only is it impossible to get it fast enough, but there is not sufficient labour in the country to build the new branches proposed. There is little likelihood of the situation being materially altered for some time to come, and hence the market is not likely to be troubled yet awhile with requests for more capital; indeed, a Montreal financier who is in close touch with the leading directors of the Canadian Pacific, and is in a position to know any financial plans they may have, has informed a Wall Street contemporary that no more Common stock will be issued "for a year at least." So far as current earnings are concerned, the Canadian Pacific during the first week of February showed a traffic decrease of $197,000, the falling off being entirely due to bad weather. From July 1 to date, however, there is an expansion of $5,635,000, equivalent to no less than 15.29 per cent. Grand Trunks last week met with considerable support, especially Thirds, investors naturally being attracted by the bright prospects which this stock offers of getting its full 4 per cent. in respect of the current year. It is not every day that the speculative investor gets the chance of buying a popular stock to give an immediate yield of 4½ per cent., with a reasonable promise of the return upon the purchase value being increased to almost 6 per cent. within a twelvemonth. It is this very cheapness of the Third Preference which makes one wonder why people should want to buy the little Ordinary, which, as I indicated last week, is a bay horse of quite another colour. Now that the public is being invited to rush headlong to purchase Little Trunks, it is advisable to recall what happened a year or two back when the stock was being introduced on the Continental Bourses. At the time to which I refer, Trunk Ordinary stood around 20, and account after account large blocks were steadily transferred into foreign names, chiefly those of people at Amsterdam and Hamburg. These speculators have now, of course, handsome paper profits, and if the British public is going to respond to the call to indulge in a wild gamble in Trunks I have no doubt our Continental friends will oblige them by liberally unloading. Seeing that there is £22,000,000 of the Ordinary in existence, would-be purchasers need not fear a dearth of floating stock. Last week there were rumours that the Grand Trunk board, under the powers it at present possesses, proposed to place a fresh issue of Guaranteed stock. This is a contingency not at all remote, and while it does not seriously modify the prospects for the Third Preference stockholders, it removes the dividend chances of the Ordinary still further into the future. In the Foreign Railway group not much has happened to call for comment apart from the further rise in Mexican Rails. It has been rumoured that the Government is buying for control, and the fact that the Ordinary stock continues to enjoy a disproportionate amount of support lends perhaps a little colour to the story. At any rate, it would be difficult to justify the upward movement in the Ordinary stock on current earnings, good as the latter are and are likely to be. Argentine Rails have remained dull. There is nothing wrong with the traffics, but recently the leading Companies have been rather generous with offers of new capital. Following upon the issues made quite recently by the Rosario and Great Western has come an emission of £1,000,000 Four per Cent. Debenture stock by the Great Southern, and a report that stock for a similar amount is to be placed by the Pacific. The action of the Great Southern Company in under-writing its new scrip with a syndicate has called forth loud protests, several large stockholders having written to the Press stating that in their opinion the proprietors would readily have applied for the whole issue had it been offered to them direct, and that in consequence the payment of the underwriting commission was an unnecessary expense. I mention the matter, but hardly think I am called upon either to criticise or justify the board in the action it took. It is for the stockholders themselves, if they think the under-writing of new issues unnecessary, to fight the question out with the directors. Below will be found my usual price table:—

ACTIVITY IN THE KAFFIR MARKET CHIEFLY CONFINED TO DIAMOND FAVOURITES—SUBSTANTIAL ADVANCE IN DE BEERS—GOLD SHARES QUIET—GENERAL BOTHA AND THE MINING INDUSTRY.

In the Kaffir market speculative activity during the past week has been practically confined to Diamond shares. A large business has been transacted in De Beers, and the price has established a fresh high record. In connection with the rise in these shares, dealings on French account have been mentioned, but it is believed that the appreciation has been mainly due to influential support accorded by a leading house on this side, and to the transaction of a large option business. Jagersfonteins have also been pretty active, and have improved in sympathy with De Beers, which it will be seen from the following table of prices have nearly reached the predicted quotation of 30:—

	Feb. 9, 1907.	Feb. 16, 1907.	Rise or Fall.
De Beers Def. (£2 10s)	27½	29 5/16	+2 1/16
Jagersfontein Def.	10 3/16	1 1/16	+ 3/16
New Vaal River	7⅛	7⅛	+ ⅛
Premier (Transvaal) Def. (2/6)	12½	12⅜	- ⅛

It is now predicted that Jagers will become more active, and that the price will rise to 12½ before very long. A fair business has been done in New Vaal Rivers, but Premiers have been rather neglected.

Turning to Kaffir Gold shares, it is a satisfactory feature that the weakness developed at the beginning of the past week as a result of a determined "bear" raid has not remained in evidence. There has been some liquidation in connection, it is reported, with the closing of a Glasgow account, but on balance, prices are not materially changed, even though fresh support has been on a very limited scale, there still being a disinclination to increase speculative commitments pending the result of the Transvaal elections to-day. As Lord Harris reminded his hearers at the Gold Trust meeting on Friday, all uncertainty as to the labour question has not yet been removed, though reassuring statements have been made by Boer politicians on this important matter. In this connection it is worthy of note that General Botha has just made a further announcement as to Boer policy. He emphatically disclaimed any hostility to the mines, and added:—"This talk of wholesale Chinese repatriation regardless of consequences is nonsense. I say emphatically that nothing shall be done to embarrass the mines so far as unskilled labour is concerned. We want to restore confidence in the country. Could we do that by crippling or hampering the mines?" This is certainly encouraging, and it is to be hoped that in the event of the Het Volkites and Nationalists gaining a decisive victory at the polls, as is predicted, they will firmly adhere to their declared policy of no repatriation without replacement. It remains, of course, also to be seen what attitude the Home Government will adopt if the Transvaal Legislature is opposed to the repatriation of the Chinese until a substitute is forthcoming, and so long as the uncertainty remains it is feared that business in Kaffirs will continue restricted so far as the public is concerned, though the announcement of the election results may stimulate professional interest to some extent.

Westralians Quiet and Generally Dull — Boulder Perseverance Ore Reserves and Dividend—Further Improvement in Deep Leads Prices.

Business has been on a small scale among West Australians, and the general tendency has been towards a lower level of values. Great Fingalls, to the weakness of which I referred last week, suffered a further decline, but the relapse to £2 was followed by some support, and it will be seen from the table below that they are unaltered on the week:—

The issue of a favourable ore reserves statement by the Boulder Perseverance has had no effect upon the shares. At the end of December last there were in reserve, according to the manager's estimate, 383,410 tons of ore, averaging 8 dwts. 17 grs. per ton, compared with 301,327 tons, averaging 9 dwts. 3 grs. per ton at the end of June last, while the "probable" ore is estimated at 226,192 tons of 6 dwts. value, as against 185,349 tons of a like value. Including the "probable" ore, the latest figures represent nearly four years' supply for the mill on the basis of the past year's scale of treatment. The Company has also announced a final dividend of 6d. per share, making a total of 1s. for 1906, which is exactly half the amount paid in respect of the preceding twelve months. All things considered, the shares appear to be over rather than under-valued at the current price of about 8s. each. Only about half that sum is represented by the ore reserves, and in view of the very heavy capital, it would require an exceedingly favourable development to add, say, 1s. per share to the value of the concern. In the Deep Leads shares speculative interest has been well maintained, and prices have further improved. News from the Loddon Valley as to the value of the "wash" at the deepest part of the river bed is awaited with considerable interest, as if it proves as satisfactory as results so far to hand have encouraged one to look for, interest in this group of shares is expected to broaden.

Rhodesians Receive a Little More Attention—January Gold Output—The Chartered Report—Satisfactory Administrative and Commercial Progress Shown.

Although they have not been active, Rhodesians have come in for rather more attention during the past week than in the preceding period. When Kaffirs were depressed under the influence of an organised "Bear" raid, Rhodesians gave way in sympathy, but they have since presented a somewhat firmer appearance. I give a table of prices below:—

The announcement of the Rhodesian gold output for the past month had practically no influence upon the market. It will be seen that the January figures represent a falling-off of 1,281 oz. compared with those for December:—

The event of the week as regards this section of the Mining markets, however, was the issue of the report of the Directors of the Chartered Company, which had been awaited with considerable interest. It made its appearance on Monday, and its immediate effect was to depress the price of the shares. As foreshadowed, the revenue of Southern Rhodesia for the year ended March, 1906, is shown to have exceeded the administrative expenditure, the actual surplus being £23,901, and while the original estimate for the twelve months ending on the 31st of next month was for a surplus of about £2,000, it is now announced that a surplus of £50,000 is confidently expected. Of course, as I explained a fortnight ago, the surplus has only been arrived at by including in the general revenue of Southern Rhodesia the bulk of the income derived there from the property of the Company. This is expected to amount in the current year to £80,000, so that the revenue from taxation and charges for administrative services only is estimated to fall short of administrative requirements by about £30,000. During 1905-6 some £48,000 of the commercial revenue had to be used in this way. A marked improvement, therefore, has been shown, and this has led the directors to observe that "as the contribution required to be made for commercial income has now been brought within such moderate limits it may reasonably be expected that the whole of the substantial and expanding commercial revenues of the Company will be before long available for general purposes." Northern Rhodesia has still much progress to make before revenue balances expenditure. For the year now nearly at an end the deficit is expected to be £68,000, whereas in 1905-6 it was over £75,000. As regards the finances of the Chartered Company itself, the balance on the wrong side is also being gradually reduced, as the following table shows:—

Year.	General Expenditure.	Revenue.	Deficit.
1900-1	£810,800	£502,500	£308,300
1901-2	933,200	586,100	347,100
1902-3	1,051,400	633,000	418,400
1903-4	1,073,800	608,300	465,500
1904-5	898,700	641,300	257,400
1905-6	803,800	698,000	105,800
1906-7	802,400*	719,000*	83,400*

* Estimated.

The deficit estimated for the current year is mainly represented by the debit balance in respect of Northern Rhodesia, which, as I have mentioned above, is expected to amount to £68,000. Turning to the references in the report as to Rhodesian affairs in general, it is certainly satisfactory to find that the directors are able to state that in spite of the continued depression in South Africa the past year in Rhodesia has been distinguished by steady and continuous progress, which has been reflected in every department of the Company's business. Greater activity in mining, agriculture, and other industries also affords further evidence of the general improvement. As regards the important question of land settlement the board is hopeful that it may be possible to report at a later date that a practical basis for co-operation has been found. Meanwhile useful preparatory work is in progress in this connection; already farms have been established at selected spots at which intending settlers can acquire cheaply the necessary training and experience before embarking their own capital. This is a step in the right direction, and another is the decision that a special committee of directors shall spend some time in Rhodesia during the present year with the main object of considering all questions of commercial policy and making definite recommendations thereon. Direct consultation with those engaged in the work of building up the industries of the country is certainly calculated to stimulate activity and encourage enterprise, to say nothing of tending towards the existence of a better feeling between all concerned.

Broken Hills Irregular—The North and Proprietary Half-yearly Statements—Zincs and the Bears—Copper Favourites' Substantial Rise—Pahang Consolidated Activity—Dolcoath's Prosperity—Mysore Dividend and the Balaghat Position.

In Broken Hill descriptions business has not been on a very large scale. At one time they showed a tendency to make a fresh start in the upward direction, but the movement was nipped in the bud by some further liquidation. However, Broken Hill Proprietaries and Norths have been helped a little by the announcement of the past half-year's results of these Companies. The North's net profits are shown to have trebled in the past half-year, the amount now reported, £49,000, comparing with £16,000 for the first six months of 1906. In the case of the Proprietary, a further increase of £80,000 in profits is shown compared with the previous half-year, while developments are reported to have materially added to the ore reserves, which on a moderate estimate are stated to amount to 3,000,000 tons, against 3,200,000 tons in May, 1905, since when 828,000 tons have been extracted. One paragraph in the Proprietary's report is likely to be of interest to many besides that Company's own shareholders. It reads as follows: "Zinc concentration plant has worked satisfactorily, producing 32,181 tons of concentrates for the half-year; some modifications have been made, the result of which has been in every way satisfactory, both with regard to working costs and better recovery of all metals." I quote this statement in view of the adverse reports that are still current as to the affairs of the Zinc Corporation, in which considerable market and public interest is displayed. It is still being asserted that the Corporation's plant is a failure, and in the absence of further official information the persistent "bear" talk has a depressing influence upon the price of the shares. Here is a sample of the adverse comment: "Is it not the fact that the amount of acid employed in treatment has wrought havoc with metallic portions of the plant, and that wood has been substituted so far without success? . . . . Will the costs have to embrace a continual renewal of plant, due to the destructive effect of the acid used?" It was officially stated last month that, owing to the action of the acid, the cast-iron pumps only lasted a few days, but these were only used as a temporary measure pending the arrival of special machinery. Shareholders were told that there might be a few weeks' delay before the plant was got into proper working order; meanwhile, they should not be disturbed by such talk as I have quoted. Apart altogether from the fact that one of the leading metallurgical experts of the day is attending to the Zinc Corporation's plant, and that the management remains confident of success, there is the definite statement by the Proprietary Company that it has produced a large quantity of zinc concentrates with its plant, and I may add that the Proprietary is employing an acid process. Turning to Copper shares, the outstanding feature has been the activity and strength of Anacondas and Tintos, which, as will be seen from the following table, have substantially advanced in value on the week:—

In connection with the activity in Anacondas there has been talk of the Amalgamated Copper intending to buy up the outstanding minority stock, while Tintos have continued on the up-grade on the strength of the important rumour I mentioned last week as to a material expansion of production being contemplated. In addition to fresh speculation for the rise, there has been extensive repurchasing by speculators who had operated for the fall, and since the above table was compiled the price has spurted more than a point further. Among the Australian Copper descriptions, Great Cobars suffered a sharp relapse, but have since recovered the greater part, if not the whole, of the ground lost. The weakness was attributed to forced liquidation and to disappointment at the board's policy of keeping profits in hand instead of commencing the payment of dividends. Mount Lyells have not been quite so active as hitherto, but Mount Elliotts have received rather more attention, and have experienced a recovery in value. It is proposed to convert the Mount Elliott into an English Company with a registered capital of £750,000 in £5 shares, shareholders receiving one new share for each of the £1 shares they now hold. It is stated that the preponderance of interest in the undertaking is now held on this side, and there seems no reason why English shareholders should object to the proposal. As regards Tin shares, the feature of the week has been a substantial advance in Pahang Consolidated, which is an amalgamation of the old Pahang Corporation and the Pahang-Kabang. A large business has been transacted in the shares of this Straits tin undertaking, and the price has risen to over £1. Reports as to the development of the property are stated to be very satisfactory, and the concern is being talked of as "the Tinto of the tin world." If large quantities of ore, averaging 7 per cent. tin—the latest value mentioned—should be developed, the undertaking would certainly have claims to be regarded as "a big thing." This is a possibility. What is an actuality is that large results are necessary to justify a quotation of about 22s. for a share of the nominal value of 5s. and only 1s. 6d. paid. It is admitted that it will be at least two years before the concern is on a paying basis, and the management is hardly likely to appreciate having prospects discounted so early by the market, as what would be a satisfactory return on the paid up capital would look insignificant on the current market capitalisation. The half-yearly report of the Dolcoath mine, Cornwall's chief tin producer, is now issued, but it contains no reference to the question of dues, which is of considerable interest at the moment. As regards the mine's results it is satisfactory to note a further increase in net profits, and that the amount—£41,757—constitutes a fresh high record in the history of the present Company, as does also the dividend of 2s. per share for the past half-year. Still, the earnings are not so large as might have been expected, considering the price ruling for tin, and the report shows that the average grade of the ore treated was not as high as in the previous half-year, while working costs per ton were a little higher. By the way, a useful little manual giving particulars of Cornish mines has been compiled by Mr. H. A. H. Russell; it is published by Effingham Wilson at 1s. Of the Indian Gold mines the Mysore announces a balance dividend of 5s. 6d. per share, making a total return of 140 per cent. for 1906, which represents a yield of 11½ per cent. per annum on the current market price of the shares. For 1905 the return to shareholders was equivalent to 145 per cent., but in March last, it will be remembered, the capital was increased by 30,000 new shares, which were issued at £6 apiece. A yield of 11 per cent. is none too much on such a share, having regard to its speculative character. It is true the Mysore mine has been developing well of late and that the immediate prospects are satisfactory enough, but experience with other mines on the same field has shown how necessary it is for shareholders to keep a close watch on developments—witness the steady decline in Balaghats during the last few weeks. The weakness of Balaghats has given rise to some criticism of the management, it being contended that an explanatory statement from the Board is due to the shareholders. The position appears to be that, in consequence of recent poor developments, it has been thought advisable to lower the average grade of the ore milled, hence the falling off in the last two months' returns. When it was found necessary about a year ago to adopt a similar policy in the case of the Champion Reef an official circular was issued to the shareholders explaining the position. A very fair amount of business has been transacted in American Gold shares, El Oros having been particularly active in view of the favourable cables received from the manager as to developments. Esperanzas have been up to £3, but have since relapsed on some fresh speculation for the fall. The January profit of this concern shows a further large falling off, in explanation of which the manager again refers to transport difficulties. Interest in the Siberian group seems to have died down, and while the West African market has not been quite stagnant, prices have been but little affected during the week.

Insurance Notes—Liability to Domestic Servants—Points in Fire Insurance—Under Insurance—Necessary Conditions—The Absolute Company.

There are many circumstances in which insurance is an absolute necessity, and when to abstain from it is the height of folly. There are other conditions in which, while not perhaps a positive necessity, it is a great advantage and constitutes an excellent investment. The new Workmen's Compensation Act, which makes householders, shopkeepers, and pretty nearly all other employers liable in the event of injury to employees from accident arising out of their employment, is the most modern and perhaps the most forcible instance of insurance being a necessity. I do not propose to deal with this subject at any great length to-day, though I contemplate doing so in the near future. When we look at the Act in detail we find that there are a great many points about it which can only be settled in the law courts, and in regard to which lawyers and insurance officials differ among themselves as to the meaning. In the meantime I am only concerned to point out that insurance is the only means of adequately providing against the liabilities to which we are to be subject from July 1 and onwards. The normal cost of insurance is 3s. a year for each indoor servant. The heaviest compensation to which we may at any time become liable is £300 in the event of death by accident, or an annuity of £52 a year for life. The cash value of such an annuity might easily amount to as much as £1,000. Besides the actual payment of compensation there is always the chance of legal proceedings, which may be of a very vexatious and expensive character; consequently, it is perfectly absurd for anybody to be so penny-wise and pound foolish as to abstain from insurance.

It is too late in the day to emphasise the necessity of fire insurance, but in this connection there are two things which it is worth while to say. If our goods are burned and we are not insured, we can at a pinch do without them or replace them gradually. But so far as compensation to domestic servants or other employees is concerned, the actual cash has to be found for settlement, and, consequently, the need for insurance against employers' liability is even more imperative than the need for fire insurance, which everybody recognises. While people recognise the need for fire insurance they by no means always realise the importance of insuring for an adequate amount. We had a very deplorable case of this kind at Selby Abbey. The fire policies amounted to only £11,000, while the cost of the damage done is something like £50,000. Now the premium for insurance of this kind is about one shilling and sixpence a year for £100, so that the authorities, in order to save premiums of £30 a year, are compelled to appeal to the public for funds to rebuild the Abbey. This habit of under-insurance is far too prevalent, not only in regard to churches, but in regard to private houses and their contents; it also quite rightly affects settlements of small fires, as well as of total losses. If a man has property worth £5,000 and insures it for only £2,000, it is only right to consider that two-fifths of the risk is carried by the insurance Company and three-fifths by the owner himself. Consequently, if damage is done to the extent of £50, the policy-holder is only entitled to expect the insurance Company to pay him £20 and should be quite content to pay the other £30 himself. I am quite aware that in certain cases the insurance Companies do not adhere to this rule and pay up more liberally than they should. I also know that settlements on this perfectly proper basis frequently cause a great deal of dissatisfaction among policy-holders simply and purely because they do not understand the subject. It is appropriate to add that there are some instances in which insurance Companies require compliance with impossible conditions and offer settlements which are by no means fair. I am always ready to give publicity to instances of this kind, but, at the same time, it happens much more frequently that people are under-insured, and that consequently when a fire occurs they do not get, and they ought not to get, payment for the full amount of the damage. I especially commend this subject of under-insurance to clergy and churchwardens. It is not perhaps easy to find an extra £10 a year for insurance of churches or other buildings, and the risk of fire is not great, but fires will happen, and it is altogether wrong to make the public pay for the neglect of those in authority.

I never pretend that insurance Companies are entirely free from faults, but in the main the rules upon which they insist are necessary and must be complied with. People unacquainted with the subject frequently regard the conditions as arbitrary and onerous, whereas they are really necessary for the conduct of the business, and for the protection which people require if it is to be provided at a moderate cost. I have several cases before me at the present time where appearances suggest that the treatment by insurance Companies has not been what it should be. I am always glad to hear of such cases and to do the best I can to help my correspondents out of a difficulty.

In this connection I should like to refer to a case upon which I commented so long ago as last July, where a policy-holder had a claim against the Absolute Life Assurance Company for the surrender value of two policies. I had to criticise pretty strongly the conduct of various people concerned, but I am glad to say that a substantial part of this claim has now been paid by the Profits and Income Insurance Company, who took over certain liabilities in regard to the policy-holders. There is a further balance to which the policy-holder is apparently entitled, but in regard to this I am afraid that the matter is still in the hands of the solicitors. So far as the Profits and Income are concerned, they have paid over the full amount which they received on account of these policies, but they decline to pay any interest in spite of having had the money in hand for some years, and I think they would have been wiser to make sure that they received enough to cover the full claim of this policy-holder. Still, rightly or wrongly, they have been relieved of liability and have dropped out of the case altogether. Other people, however, are left in who are taking up an attitude which, in all the circumstances, is quite inappropriate. They have attempted to maintain that the policy-holder was only an ordinary creditor, in which case he should have been paid nothing; they must have consented to his being paid £300 out of something like £400 which was due. There is no dispute about the amount of the claim, the only question being whether my correspondent was a policy-holder or an ordinary creditor. The payment already made seems to be an admission that he is a policy-holder, and consequently ranks in front of debenture holders and is entitled to be paid in full. But after having practically admitted his title (probably because the Profits and Income insisted upon it), those in whose hands the matter now rests decline to acknowledge his title, and intimate that "he must take whatever steps he thinks necessary in the matter." He obtained judgment against the Company so long ago as April 28, 1902, and the settlement having been delayed for nearly five years, he is invited to indulge in further legal proceedings and further delay. It is rather difficult to ascertain the precise responsibility of different people in this connection, but some of them are respectable and might be expected to use their influence to prevent the continuance of this scandal. The liquidator is Mr. D. F. Basden, of Mellors, Basden, and Co., and the receiver for the debenture holders Mr. D. Rae Fraser, both of whom have expressed the opinion that, as far as they can see, my correspondent's claim should be paid. Considering the matter has been standing over for nearly five years, it should have immediate attention, and, in the improbable event of there being any legal defence to the claim, the grounds of this opinion should be stated. If there is no defence, steps should be taken for the immediate payment of the amounts due. Elaborate regulations for winding up insurance Companies are contained in various Acts of Parliament. If the procedure in the case of the Absolute is a fair specimen of how these Acts work, the law certainly leaves a great deal to be desired.

Niekerk and Southern Klerksdorp Scheme.

Several correspondents have written to me for advice with regard to the latest development in connection with the affairs of Niekerk, Ltd. I have replied to them in my usual column, but propose to deal with the matter here, as it appears to me to be one which calls for exposure. At the beginning of last year the Niekerk underwent reconstruction, a liability of 2s. 6d. per 10s. share being created, and shareholders were told that if they supported the scheme the new Company would be in a position, after paying off its trade and other creditors and discharging the cost of reconstruction, to start with an available cash working capital of about twice the amount of the requirements as estimated by the two experts who had examined the mine. These experts recommended a total expenditure of £13,000, and held out the prospect of getting some £22,000 to £30,000 returned as profit from the ore developed, "besides opening up the mine and being able to carry on your future work on a sound basis." So far, however, from finding themselves with a profit or their undertaking on a sound basis, Niekerk shareholders have recently been informed that the Company is in debt, and that an option on their property has been granted by the Board to another concern called the Southern Klerksdorp Gold Mines, Ltd. Moreover, they have received documents showing that the Southern Klerksdorp has allotted to them some of its own £1 shares—not fully-paid, but carrying a liability of 5s. per share. In other words, Niekerk shareholders are expected to provide the Southern Klerksdorp with £30,000, out of which it will pay off the Niekerk's liabilities, expected to amount to about half that sum. There is nothing to show that the Southern Klerksdorp has at present anything worth fifteen hundred pence. Its capital is stated to be £250,000, and it is alleged to have property adjacent to the Niekerk. But there is no evidence that any of its capital remains intact, or that any work has been done on its property. It is audacious, therefore, to attempt to foist partly paid Southern Klerksdorp shares on holders of Niekerks and expect them to finance a concern of which they have no information of any value, in order to retain an interest in their own property. It would be much cheaper for Niekerk shareholders to go through another reconstruction than to subscribe to this "Southern Klerksdorp Relief Scheme," as it has been aptly described. In the official circular it is stated that in addition to liabilities and cost of liquidation, in all about £15,500, a sum of £3,000 to £4,000 would be sufficient to restart the battery "with profitable results." In view of the fate of past promises, it would, perhaps, be unwise to attach too much importance to the words quoted, but in the event of Niekerk shareholders wanting to keep their property to themselves an assessment of 1s. 6d. per share would more than meet the immediate financial requirements, as officially estimated.

Very Fishy.

Included in a batch of bucket-shop circulars which a reader forwarded to me the other day was one from "Charles and Co.," 73, Moorgate-street, E.C. This is the nom de guerre of a certain Frederick C. A. Spiegel who, in February, 1905, made over his business to a Company styled "Charles, Limited," of which he became governing director for life. He has outlived the Company, which at the end of about a year came to a stop with liabilities to the amount of £6,778 against assets estimated as worth £234. Since then Spiegel has carried on business on his own account as "Charles and Co." Two or three weeks ago he was sued in the City of London Court for a fishmonger's bill of £20, which debt he was ordered to pay by instalments of £5 a month. From these bare facts anyone can judge for himself what chance he will have of making money out of dealings with "Charles and Co."

Three Blind Pools.

It is amusing to notice what very different estimates of the gullibility of the public are formed by the promoters of bucket-shop blind pools. William Murray, The London and Counties Exchange, Imperial Buildings, New Bridge-street, E.C., believes in moderation. In soliciting your participation in his next operation he contents himself with asserting that the last was closed in four days with a net profit of £1 1s. 9d. on each £10 share. Evidently his notion is that if he does not put the profits too high, you will be all the more likely to credit him with the infallibility which is implied in his further statement that he had "an unbroken run of twenty-six successes last year." His namesake, A. Murray, The London Scottish Stock Exchange, 20, Bucklersbury, E.C., makes a bolder appeal to your credulity and cupidity. He expects you to swallow the story that this concern paid a net profit of £13 10s. 5d. on each £10 subscribed to its last "Stock Union," and that the total net profit in five such operations in a little over two months has been no less than £42 17s. 6d. on each £10 share. Bolder even than the L.S.S.E. are Digby, Curtis, and Co., 40 and 41, Sackville-street, W. They "point with satisfaction to such returns as £31 5s., £35, £42 10s., and £50 on each £10 share," and intimate that they are now about "to eclipse all previous efforts!" One would suppose that anybody fit to be at large would pause to consider why people able to coin money in this magical way should be offering to do so for the benefit of strangers, instead of piling up fortunes for themselves. But this idea never enters the head (though it obviously cannot be for lack of room there) of the dupes of such firms as the three above mentioned.

The Foolishness of Small Investors.

This is a theme that lends itself to humorous treatment, but some of the letters that I get from very small investors are not without an element of pathos. Here, for example, is one from a man who just twelve months ago started a still unfinished operation in a home railway stock with a sum of £3, deposited as a 3 per cent. margin. The price of the £100 stock then was 71. It soon receded, and ever since he has been paying trifling amounts to carry over, and occasionally another pound or two for additional cover. He has been credited with one dividend, but the net result of his little speculation is that if he closes the transaction now—which is the wisest thing that he can do—he will be about £10 out of pocket, and that, I gather, is a very serious loss to a man in his position. Obviously, people who cannot afford to risk £5 or £10 ought not to speculate in stocks or shares at all, but to keep their money in the Post Office Savings Bank. And even those amateurs who are able to adventure larger amounts would do well to remember that the odds are against their making money on margins—very long odds indeed, if they are operating more or less on the advice of an outside firm who stand to gain by their clients' losses.

Another correspondent seeking my advice is a private in the army. He had been ensnared into paying down a penny each for 180 sixpenny shares in the British Exploration and Development Company, and he says he understands that he will have to find another 30s. in six months' time. This is the Company "now being incorporated under the laws of the State of Arizona" to which I referred in a note last week anent the circulars issued by Martin and Church, Craven House, Kingsway, W.C. It was "The London Stock and Bond Exchange," of the same address—doubtless the same sharps under another alias—who gammoned this poor soldier into parting with his 15s. In my opinion, such a proceeding is nothing better than pocket-picking.

The Bishop Creek Wild Cat.

In a letter from "The Lombard Association," 45, Lombard-street, E.C., Mr. J. H. Watts—is this gentleman the "association"?—writes to me as follows:—

> We observe in this week's issue you state that you refused insertion of the Bishop Creek Gold Company. This is not the whole truth, for your own canvasser called here and solicited the order, which was accordingly sent you through our advertising agents. We note that you do not point out that purchasers of the shares are given one month to pay for same, during which time they are at liberty to make inquiries regarding the undertaking and cancel their orders should the result be unsatisfactory. Why act half the truth?

I have no objection whatever to making known the fact that a canvasser asked for the advertisement, which nevertheless was refused insertion in Truth. On the contrary, that fact is the best possible evidence of the strictness of the supervision which is exercised over advertisements in this paper. Occasionally a canvasser may make a mistake in applying for an order, but if the Editor of Truth regards an advertisement as undesirable it is at once rejected, in spite of any order that may have been given. There are newspapers whose advertisement columns are not subjected to any sort of editorial control, but Truth is not conducted in that way. As to the second part of Mr. Watts's letter, I strongly advise the purchasers of shares in the Bishop Creek Gold Company to cancel their orders at once.

"A British Goldfield."

Interest has recently developed on the Stock Exchange in the shares of a concern known as the Chastan Syndicate, the founders of which are reported to have discovered the existence of many miles of gold-bearing formation somewhere in Great Britain. The affair is "wrop in a mystry," and it seems to be a case of mystery lending enchantment to the undertaking; at any rate, the £1 shares of the syndicate have been run up in price to £5 10s. apiece during the past week. According to rumour, the secret of the locality of this British goldfield is known only to five persons, and will be kept dark until options over the whole line of "auriferous banket"—as it is termed—have been secured. As to the exact extent of the formation, reports differ; one gives it as forty-five miles, and another as thirty-one miles. A statement that the locality is within a couple of hundred miles from London has created an impression that it is in Wales that this "Golconda" exists which it has been left to Chastanites to discover, and the fact that gold-bearing reefs have been found and worked in Wales apparently makes people more ready to listen to the talk about the Chastan Syndicate. Some of the stories in circulation are of a very "tall" order. For instance, it is said that cottages in the neighbourhood of this "goldfield" are built of the "auriferous banket"! Possibly some enthusiast will go one better and report that, armed with a bucket and a shovel, one could, with but little exertion, secure a pile of pure metal. It seems that one has only to mention the word "banket" to some people and they will immediately have visions of untold wealth, merely because they happen to know that a large amount of gold has been won from the Rand "banket" formation. But "banket" is merely a descriptive term for a conglomerate having a similar appearance to the sweetmeat "almond rock." Plenty of such conglomerate is to be found in various parts of the world besides South Africa, but that it contains gold in anything like payable quantities has yet to be proved. And as regards the concern interested in this British "banket," I may point out that this is not the first mysterious syndicate on whose shares a big premium has been established. Whether the Chastan will prove less disappointing than the others when the air of mystery no longer surrounds its affairs remains to be seen.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

RAILWAYS.

Caledonian.—1. The Company has been spending too liberally out of capital. The present yield is absurdly small, and I do not look for any early recovery. 2. Hulls would be a likely purchase. Tenderfoot.—The real estate question is out of my province. You could invest your money with reasonable hope of an improving return in Grand Trunk Third Preference. Rolyat.—You had better close the transaction. With your very small capital it is utter folly to speculate at all. H. C.—The line was sold to the Indian Government last year, but there was, as is not unusual in deals of the kind, a lot of delay, and the contract was not signed until November. Seeing that interest at 3 per cent. on the sum to be paid to the company will be allowed from January 1, 1906, until date of payment, the shareholders have little cause to complain. Raymond.—1. Yes. 2. I doubt if you will gain much by delaying a purchase. See this week's comments.

MINES.

Wamba.—I do not see much attraction in No. 2, but the others appear hopeful holdings for dividends and ultimate appreciation in value. Little Kaffir.—1. and 3. In the event of a moderate recovery it would seem a good plan to realise with a view to exchanging into something more promising. 2. A fair speculation among low-priced Kaffirs. As to your further inquiry, there would appear to be a fair chance of your being able to repurchase at a lower price, but, obviously, such an operation would be a pure speculation. Wizard.—Highly speculative, but may have some recovery eventually China.—The Company is not doing well at present, but it has a large area, and there is a fair chance of better grade ore being developed. A purchase must be considered very speculative. Exon.—I do not see much attraction in a purchase at present.—Republique.—1. I understand the public issue was not a success, and that the underwriters had to take a large proportion of the shares. 2. These should have some recovery when interest in Rhodesians generally revives. 3. You will see from my rules that I never recommend brokers. W. C., Taunton.—I cannot trace the concerns named. You had better try to get in touch with some one in the locality; failing this, try the Engineering and Mining Journal, of New York. J. W. H.—These seem fair speculations. Stoke.—The shares may be taken in hand again later on, but they are a very speculative holding. Galen.—The phrase implies that there are sellers of the shares on any improvement in the price. Still, you may as well keep your shares for the dividends. X. Y.—Of your list I should select Chillagoes and Briseis Tin at present prices. Medico.—Hold Knights. Secure a good profit on the others.

MIXED SECURITIES.

Daghest.—1. You need have no difficulty in getting the requisite 3¼—3½. I would suggest dividing the money between India Threes, Metropolitan Water Board Threes, Great Western Five per Cent. Debentures, Cape Threes, and Jamaica Threes. 2. The market is in a very forlorn condition at present, but I think it would be a pity to part with the stock now. Better hold for a moderate recovery. F. E. A.—My advice would be to spread the money over the following securities, as by doing so you could get from 4½ to 5 per cent., without much risk:—Buenos Ayres Western Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds, U.S. Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, Brazilian Companhia Lloyd Five per Cent. bonds, National Railroad of Mexico Four per Cent. First Mortgage bonds, Grand Trunk Five per Cent. Second Preference, Imperial Tobacco Preferred, and Pears' Preference. Quiverful.—I would suggest spreading the money over Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series), Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, National Railroad of Mexico Four per Cent. First Mortgage bonds, National Telephone First Preference, Erie Railroad Four per Cent. General Lien bonds, Buenos Ayres Western Four and a Half per Cent. New Preference, Argentine Great Western Five per Cent. New Debentures, Great Western of Brazil Six per Cent. Permanent Debentures, City and South London Railway Five per Cent. Preference, and United Railways of Havana Five per Cent. Cumulative Preference. St. Leonards.—2. So far as I am aware, its position is satisfactory, and business is increasing. 3 and 4. Hold. 5. The debentures are worth keeping, seeing that they enjoy the joint guarantee of the Argentine Great Western and the B. A. and Pacific. 6. I have no information about this company's prospects. Chummey.—1. I should not advise the purchase. 2. Buy, if you can afford to pay for the stock; I doubt if you would make money over a call option. 3. I do not recommend brokers. Plasmon.—1 and 2. I have no special information that would justify me in recommending either. 3. A very speculative selection. 4. A promising speculative investment. Discrimination.—1. You see a good profit, and I think you ought to take it in view of the adverse criticism of the company. Anyway, the shares are not such as I would recommend for a permanent investment. 2. The shares appear a fair speculative lock-up, and unless you are desirous of making a change you may as well hold. 3. Bovril Ordinary and Pettigrews are desirable, and, as a high yielding industrial, the other is fair. 4. In the circumstances they certainly appear rather low-priced.

INSURANCE.

Carpenter.—I have never heard of the company you ask about; it is not mentioned in any reference books. You should effect your insurance in some other company. Try the Central or Fine Art. I will make inquiries about the office you name, and may have more to say next week. Melrux.—The company is quite sound, and its prospects are particularly good. The shares should become very valuable in course of time. As to your second question, I have referred to this wild-cat scheme in my last two issues, and again this week.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Granite.—I will publish a warning against the firm, but I cannot recommend a solicitor, and probably you would only be throwing good money after bad if you sued them. E. H. B.—How it is done is a financial mystery. W. H. S. M.—I cannot recommend a solicitor. M. H.—Your inquiry as to a tradesman's financial position is altogether outside my province. R. D. C.—The first-named firm has been adversely criticised in TRUTH. You should deal with a member of the Stock Exchange, but I cannot recommend one. E. R. C. and G. C., Malta.—Have nothing to do with the International Securities Syndicate. Ottoman.—No doubt you saw my references to Melville, Glyn, and Co., and Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. last week. In the case of proceedings against these firms in the French Courts, I can make no exception to my rule by giving you the name of a solicitor in Paris. Negra and Premium, Ilford.—Apply to the Crédit Lyonnais or Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle Street, E.C. Anglo.—1. The fall has been due partly to what were considered unsatisfactory features of the chairman's statement at the recent meeting, and partly to profit-taking. 2. It is a favourite stock for a gamble, and should be regarded from that standpoint. Calais.—1. I do not recommend brokers. 2, 3, and 4. You ought not to risk your small capital in any such extremely speculative transaction. Better buy a few shares outright. Interested.—I have no information about this local concern. Alpha.—1. Do not join in any "blind pool." 2. Obviously a concern to avoid; I will refer to the pamphlet in an early issue. Mene.—Consult a solicitor. Civis, Oxford; Mea; H. B., Birkenhead; and Medicus.—I cannot undertake to give an opinion upon the firms or the publications mentioned in your letters, but my advice is that you should deal through a member of the Stock Exchange. Furst.—See preceding answer to your third question. As to the shares, the business is manifestly more or less speculative. Belfast.—Hold. Seaside.—Very doubtful indeed. It would be foolish to buy any more. Alexander Kyle.—Clearly a common cover-snatching firm. H. A. B.—1. As an investment I do not consider the shares attractive. 2. Regret my inability to advise you in the matter. Inquire locally. B. B.—With an improved Kaffir market they would probably go higher. I think you might hold. A. C. M.—The so-called corporation is one that you could profitably avoid. Harrogate.—1. Even at the low price I do not regard the shares as being attractive. 2. They may go higher with other motor shares. Marius.—An exchange into Zincs, or the other share, especially upon a reaction might turn out well. Martaux.—The threatened further legislation is, of course, not calculated to benefit such shares. Sell out and put the proceeds into something with prospects. Lora.—Hold on a little longer. B., High Holborn.—Have not a high opinion of the shares. Mrs. P., Lee.—Lyons' Preference are safe enough, and Cement Debentures are not unattractive, though scarcely gilt-edged. The others I do not fancy. Components do not seem to be a very promising speculation. Diogenes.—A, D, E, and F, might suit you. A purchase of C might turn out well on any reaction. Pancha.—The commercial possibilities of the process have yet to be demonstrated, and in any case it will be a long time before the price of nitrate is affected. Equus.—1. You are liable for the call unless you can prove misrepresentation, or unless the board decide not to press for it. 2. I am unable to express any opinion. 3. Purely speculative. As regards their class they are fair. The debenture capital is certainly large in proportion to the amount of Preference and Ordinary, but the value of the property accounts for this to a certain extent. Britnor.—Good industrial investments. A. L. K.—Scarcely a gilt-edged, or even silver-edged, investment, in view of the financial difficulties that have beset the undertaking. Two Girls.—If you rely upon the income it would be wise not to change the investment into such industrials as you name, not one of which strikes me as being a particularly "safe" investment. Newbridge, Kildare.—The company is, I believe, still in existence, and if you addressed a query to the secretary a reply ought to be forthcoming. Radis.—It seems rather a poor selection. Security, N.B.—This stock seems to be well secured. I cannot reply by telegram, and your stamped form is returned. O. W. M.—The only thing to do is to await developments. G. F. D.—I have no special knowledge of the society in question. If you want 4½ or 5 per cent. you must take some risk. Erie.—Of course, you are not liable in the circumstances you mention. The man is a swindler. Hold Rosarios; it will be time to name a limit at which the stock should be sold later on.

INDUSTRIALS MORE LIVELY—ANGLO "A" SLUMP—"BAYS" HIGHER—BREWERIES AND THE BILL—MOTORS STILL STRONG.

There has been, on the whole, rather more cheerfulness in the Industrial market, though the general improvement in view was to some extent retarded by the depressing influence of the slump in Anglo-American Telegraph Deferred, which brought about two or three small failures. Various unpleasant rumours were afloat in reference to the heavy selling of this stock, one being that it was a case of "ratting" on the part of a member of a big "bull" syndicate; but probably certain passages in the speech of the Chairman of the Company at the recent meeting also helped to unnerve a good many holders of Anglo "A." However, by the end of the week signs of a recovery were seen, the closing price on Saturday being 21⅛-21⅜ xd., as against the low-water mark of 20 on the previous day. Anglo "B" was but very slightly affected by the fall in the Deferred, and on the current price, which gives a yield of almost 5½ per cent., it is a not unattractive purchase. In the same group, Eastern Telegraph stock, yielding nearly 5 per cent., and Direct U.S. Cable shares, yielding 5¾ per cent., are both worthy of attention. There has been some recrudescence of interest in Hudson's Bays, which, partly in sympathy with other Canadian securities, and partly on the renewal of a rumour as to the splitting of the shares, have been run up 5 points. It is of course quite possible that they will be carried yet higher, but a purchase must obviously be very speculative. In accordance with the intimation which was made at the meeting two or three weeks ago, a representative of the foreign shareholders has joined the Board of the Pekin Syndicate, whose issues have at the same time met with more support, and on the week show a small advance. As regards Brewery stocks, the announcement in the King's Speech that a Licensing Bill will be introduced had been pretty well discounted, but a few further declines have been recorded, and I shall not be surprised if the downward movement continues. It is practically inevitable that the Bill will have an adverse effect on prices, though on the other hand it is probable that the apprehensions of the trade as to the actual results of coming legislation will in the long run turn out to have been absurdly exaggerated. In the Catering section, Lyons have again been the most conspicuous feature, and another small advance has been made. The Company has secured on very favourable terms the entire control of the refreshment department of the Irish International Exhibition which is to be opened in Dublin in May; but apart from this it is known to be doing a large and increasing business, and, as I recently observed, the shares continue to provide a good commercial investment. A very satisfactory report is presented by Maple and Co., Ltd., for, in spite of keener competition in the furnishing business, this well-known house has enjoyed an increased measure of prosperity during 1906, the net profit, after deducting Debenture charges and Preference dividends, being £123,282, as compared with £122,008 for 1905 and £112,300 for 1904. The dividend on the Ordinary shares will again be 15 per cent., and an addition of £10,750 to the reserve raises the fund to a total of £332,050. At the existing prices, Maple's Six per Cent. Preference shares yield about 4⅜ per cent., and the Ordinary shares nearly 5¾ per cent.; both may be commended as attractive industrial investments. It may be interesting to mention that there are now 7,528 debenture-holders and shareholders in this Company. Textiles have not received much attention during the week, but there has been a continuance of activity in motor shares, Argylls, Daimlers, Darracqs, and Humbers all moving up. There has been some talk of a possible amalgamation between the Daimler and another Company, but this is not generally regarded as probable.

QUEER STORY.

THE KENWIG-STREET MURDER.

(Queer Story Puzzle: TRUTH, December 19, 1906.)

AWARD OF PRIZES.

THE laborious work of examining the thousand odd solutions sent in by way of answer to the above has now been completed. And it may be of interest to competitors to know the general result of the scrutiny. Every one of the six suspected persons, viz., Jeffs, Mrs. Jeffs, Selina Prowse, the Rev. R. Fillmore, Tunks, and Louisa Lamport, finds a large number of adherents. But Jeffs with nearly 600 supporters is first favourite. This is doubtless due to the fact that the weight of evidence, contained or implied in the story, makes it pretty clear that Jeffs was the forger of the cheque on Amy Beadle's account, and of the covering letter to the bank. Many competitors seem to have jumped to the conclusion that the forger and the murderer were the same person. That, however, is in fact erroneous, and is moreover, in logic, a bad deduction. The forger of the cheque had no motive for the murder. Indeed, his interests lay exactly in the opposite direction, for reasons which will appear below.

Now excluding Jeffs, and presuming— a presumption on the whole supported by the weight of evidence—that the murder was committed by one of the three persons in the house—we are left with Mrs. Jeffs and Selina Prowse. There is, it is true, a certain amount of prima facie evidence against Prowse—of which many ingenious solvers have made the most. But several considerations make it improbable that she should have been the murderess. In the first place, she had no adequate motive for putting her neck in danger. In the next place, the subsequent precautions taken to divert suspicion were clearly the handiwork of an educated person, not of an ignorant maid-of-all-work. Therefore, even judging the question strictly on its merits, and without reference to the author's solution (which by the published terms of the competition has to be taken as the standard), Selina Prowse may fairly be excluded.

This process of elimination fixes the crime upon Mrs. Jeffs (the murderess given in the author's solution), and no solution, however ingenious, which goes wrong on this main issue, could, of course, be entertained. It only remains, therefore, to consider the "Mrs. Jeffs" solutions.

Upwards of a hundred of these were sent in. After careful examination some seventy of them were weeded out, forty-three being left in for further consideration. In order to ensure their being thoroughly considered, these forty-three solutions were submitted to a small jury of experts, with instructions to select the three best—i.e., the three which came nearest to the author's solution.

Their award is as follows:—

Prize solution, that sent in by LA MANCHA.
2nd best " " " " " NEW YORK.
3rd best " " " " " WATTY.

LA MANCHA, therefore, is awarded the first prize of fifteen guineas, NEW YORK the second prize of five guineas, and WATTY the third prize of two guineas.

These three successful competitors are requested to write, in their own names, making application for their prizes, in accordance with the published regulations.

For the benefit of competitors generally, I print herewith the prize solution, with criticisms subjoined, showing its strong and weak features, and also pointing out where it differs materially from the author's solution.

Question 1.—Who was Amy Beadle's murderer?—Mrs. Jeffs.

Question 2.—What was the murderer's motive? Jealousy. After being convinced of Amy Beadle's condition and that her husband was Amy's seducer.

Question 3.—What was the evidence by which he, or she, was convicted?—Mrs. Jeffs' finger-print on Amy's nightdress.

Question 4.—How are the various circumstances that involved innocent persons in suspicion to be explained away?—Mr. Jeffs will be found to have the tattoo mark above his wrist, and will be identified by the bank cashier as having presented Amy Beadle's forged cheque.

Shuckpenny's evidence will show that Jeffs was in pressing financial difficulties, which were arranged on Wednesday by a payment of notes and gold, part proceeds of forgery uttered the same day. It may be inferred that the result of Jeffs' flirtation with Amy was to give him information of Amy's account at the bank, and when he committed the forgery he fully intended to pay it back, and he drew a little more than what was owing to Shuckpenny, as Christmas bills were falling due. After the murder by quiet smothering, after Amy had gone to bed, Mrs. Jeffs found Amy's letter to her mother on the dressing table undated, which explained things. This letter she dated and posted on Thursday, though, of course, it must have been written at the latest on Wednesday night, January 1. Mrs. Jeffs, upon the discovery of her terrible mistake, confessed to her husband what she had done in her rage.

Mrs. Jeffs overlooked the allusion to £200 in Amy's letter, but posted it as a fair implication of Tunks, diverting suspicion from themselves, and Jeffs has then to confess his forgery, and they plan how to throw suspicion on Fillmore by opening the window and putting mud on the ladder, and two notes in the offertory bag on Sunday—one note was to be given to Selina Prowse, which was done on Thursday evening or Friday morning—without knowing what Selina had told the Inspector. This may have been hush money, or a simple Christmas present. Louisa Lamport's gratuitous evidence may be explained as a device to put Inspector Minshull on the track of Selina Prowse or Mr. Fillmore, and avert Tunks' detention on suspicion, if the Inspector heard of Amy's entanglement with Tunks. This would give them time to elope without being shadowed. Tunks would have urged her to do this. The three notes cashed by Tunks, stolen from Madame Chapote, were part of what Shuckpenny had paid Madame Chapote, and Shuckpenny will be able to show other notes, part of Mr. Jeffs' payment on Wednesday.

Mr. Jeffs, being a man of business, would have been fully aware of the folly of taking notes from the bank, if he had contemplated murder; but when he found what his wife had done, he got rid of all the notes in his possession by giving one to Selina and the remaining two in the offertory. With the exception of the date, Amy Beadle's letter to her mother is clearly genuine—but it must have been written on Wednesday night.

Mrs. Jeffs would not have forged this letter of Amy to her mother alluding to the £200.

Strong suspicion would have rested on Tunks and Lamport, but the notes put into the offertory on Sunday absolved them, as they could not have been in the neighbourhood of the church on Sunday, since they cleared off on Saturday.

December 25, 1906. La Mancha

Observations on Prize Solution.

Question 2.—"Jealousy," etc. The solver does not expressly state that the jealousy was founded on a misapprehension; though this is evidently implied in his answer to question 4.

Question 3.—Evidence: "Mrs. Jeffs' finger print on Amy's nightdress." Although a finger print is now regarded as positive evidence of identification, this evidence might here be considerably strengthened. In the author's solution, Mrs. Jeffs is assumed to have previously cut her finger—the exertion involved in smothering Amy causing the blood to ooze from the wound. The mark of this cut would be visible on the finger print, and would thus make the identification doubly sure. Further, in the author's solution, it is mentioned that there was a faint smear of blood on Amy's letter to her mother—a piece of evidence that would throw significant light on the mystery of the date, January 2; of which more below.

Question 4.—La Mancha's answers to this question are, on the whole, excellent, and generally tally with the author's solution. Jeffs had flirted with Amy, in order to win her confidence about her financial affairs. He did forge the cheque, meaning either to repay the money, or in the alternative (La Mancha does not add this), trusting to his influence over Amy to make it right with her in the event of discovery. In this confidence, he did take part of the money in notes at the bank (La Mancha does not expressly point out that a request for all gold would immediately have aroused the cashier's suspicion), and he did pass some of the notes to Shuckpenny before the murder. Subsequently, when, to his horror and dismay, he learnt of the murder, he did unload certain of the remaining notes in such a manner as to direct suspicion both on to the Curate and on to Selina Prowse.

La Mancha is correct in saying that he put two of the notes into the offertory; but incorrect in saying that he gave one to Selina Prowse. This would have been a fatally weak thing to do. The author assumes—far more probably—that he purposely left the note in Selina Prowse's way, so that she might find and appropriate it.

So much for the forgery—a crime entirely distinct from, and independent of, the murder. Now to come back to the perplexing question of Amy Beadle's misdated letter to her mother. Here La Mancha hits upon the right explanation. Mrs. Jeffs finds the letter immediately after the murder. It shows her that she has committed a terrible crime under a complete misapprehension; that Tunks, not Jeffs, is the father of Amy's unborn child. And she acts just as La Mancha states, as the best way to divert suspicion from herself.

La Mancha, however, is wrong in saying that she overlooked the mention of the £200 in the letter. She did not confess her crime of murder to Jeffs (as La Mancha states), nor did he confess his crime of forgery to her. Hence, it was in ignorance of the forgery that she despatched the letter next morning to Amy's mother (filling in the date in imitation of the girl's unformed handwriting), and not knowing that, by so doing, she was giving Jeffs away. The date, January 2, the day of despatch, may have been, as La Mancha implies, merely an oversight; or it may have been, as the author's solution suggests, the result of deliberate calculation; i.e., inserted in order to make it appear that Amy was alive after midnight of January 1; whereas Mrs. Jeffs could have proved by her husband's evidence (which might, or might not, have been accepted) that she did not leave her bedroom subsequently to that hour.

And here, while we are on the subject of the letter, I cannot refrain from quoting a particularly luminous and well-reasoned passage, which I find in the solution of Sleuth Hound. Sleuth Hound puts himself out of court by giving Fillmore as the forger; but his remarks on the subject of the letter are so much to the point, and so exactly bear out what the author had in his mind, that they are deserving of publicity. He writes:—

> It is clear from the evidence of the letter that the murderer and the forger cannot have been identical. It was written on the evening of January 1 ("having only just returned from the shop"), but the date shows that it was not posted until January 2, and this must have been inserted by another hand. The letter, therefore, was lying in Amy's room at the time of the murder It clearly shows that a forgery had been committed, and the murderer, if also the forger, would have destroyed it. The murderer, however, if in ignorance of the forgery, might well post it in order to throw suspicion on Tunks. The insertion of the day of posting, instead of that of the previous day, was a fatal, if not altogether unnatural, blunder.

The case against Jeffs, as the forger, being also the murderer, or an accessory to the murder, could not have been more convincingly stated.

It now only remains to congratulate competitors generally on the ingenuity and acumen that most of their solutions show. I had no idea that Truth numbered among its readers so many potential Sherlock Holmeses, and I propose, before long, to give them another opportunity of exercising their talents on a further problem, of which particulars will be announced in due course.

I should mention that, in addition to the four competitors specifically mentioned above, the following have also sent in solutions giving Mrs. Jeffs as the murderess. (N.B.—In this list are not included those solutions which give Jeffs and Mrs. Jeffs acting in concert—that theory being entirely incompatible with the author's solution.)

In addition to the above, several unsigned solutions have also been received, and several more from competitors who have disqualified themselves by attaching their real names and addresses, in contravention of the published regulations.

MUSIC.

THE BITTER CRY OF THE ANTI-MODERNS.

IN his interesting and valuable book on programme music which has just been issued by Messrs. Novello, Professor Niecks suggests that, looking to the present condition of music, the outlook is profoundly unsatisfactory:—

> If we can boast of improvement (he observes), it is only technical improvement in some directions. In all other respects we are getting poorer and poorer, and are face to face with imminent bankruptcy. The road on which we are travelling offers no prospect, and the increase of complexity and sensationalism cannot go on for ever. We must strike out in a different direction. There was a great revolution in music about 1600. We may therefore, without unreasonableness, expect another—the present age is ripe for it and longing for it. And what do we want? Simplicity, sanity, spontaneity, and, above all and including all, beauty—natural, gracious, persuasive beauty."

To much the same effect spoke Sir A .C. Mackenzie the other day at the Royal Institution:—

> To what all these strange and artful experiments in iconoclasm were destined to lead was not easily observable. To imagine that the art would ever revert to a state of Mozartian or even an artificial kind of simplicity after all it had acquired to itself through the long succession of the masters was as unreasonable as to think that this lawless and boneless system of composition [of Debussy] was likely to remain permanent. . . . . It was said that this was the harmonic age of music, and that the next phase would show the further exploitation of rhythm—perhaps of other modes beside the ordinary major and minor now chiefly in use. If the age of thematic invention were in sight it would be more welcome than any other.

Read further on the same subject the views of an eminent foreign musician—M. Ysaye:—

> Music nowadays is going too fast, under the influence of Strauss and Debussy. Every year sees something new and sensational in the art, but the question is whether anything really new is being done in the cause of music. I would like it to rest for a time—say, half a century—so as to let things simmer down to their proper value. Music has gone off the track, and no one knows where it is at present.

Here, then, are the views of three eminent and typical musicians on the musical tendencies of the day, and it is certain that they express thoughts widely entertained. Many others besides Professor Niecks are of opinion that the age is ripe for music of a more attractive type than it is getting at present. Sir A. C. Mackenzie is not alone in sighing for a return to the halcyon days of melodiousness and intelligibility. M. Ysaye speaks for many in pleading for a less feverish rate of progress. Carlyle, when folks were disposed to go too fast, used to recommend them to go to bed for a week and reconsider themselves. M. Ysaye's suggestion of a fifty years' armistice, so to speak, is still more drastic, though it is certain that it would have the cordial support of many. The musical world, in short, would seem to be in something like revolt at present against the excesses of its leaders. The sheep look up and are not fed. Plain people long for a time when the Strausses and Regers shall cease from troubling and the Debussys shall be at rest. In a way, no doubt, there is nothing very surprising in this. Since the earliest days of the art the same kind of protests have doubtless been heard. Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner—all of the great ones in turn have been similarly assailed.

At the same time, it is permissible to doubt if the pace of the leaders were ever before quite so furious as it would seem to be to-day. Is it possible that Beethoven's C minor affected its hearers quite so violently as, say, Strauss's "Heldenleben" when the latter was first produced? One knows that Beethoven's finest works were criticised and condemned by many of his contemporaries, that it was long the practice to omit the final section of the choral symphony, that the posthumous quartets were reckoned the productions of a mind unhinged, and so on. But even so it is difficult to believe that quite the same intensity of feeling was excited which Strauss, Reger, and the rest at their best—or worse—arouse. Yet it is needful only to recall some of the choicest utterances of the anti-Wagnerians less than fifty years ago to realise that history may be only repeating itself to-day. A well-known New York musical critic has lately drawn up, in connection with the "Salome" affair, a catalogue of the opprobrious terms which have been applied to Strauss's work, and it makes instructive reading. If it were merely a question of exciting sufficient contemporary scorn, Strauss should certainly be able to count on ultimate fame and popularity.

Unfortunately it does not necessarily follow that the composer who most startles and shocks his own generation will prove the greatest delight of later ages, and it is the mistake of too many of the younger musicians of to-day that they fail to recognise this rather obvious truth. Strauss is, of course, an indubitable genius. His music may not appeal to all, but no one can deny its wonderful qualities. Unluckily, the same hardly applies to the works of some of those less richly endowed, who, fired by his success, strive to follow in his footsteps. Just as a generation ago it was a case of Wagner or Brahms with all the younger men, so to-day Strauss and Debussy are the idols to whom aspiring youth loves to play, in Stevenson's phrase, the "sedulous ape." In England, it may be, we have not at present suffered very greatly in this way, but in France and Germany they say the case stands very differently. It is only to be hoped that the malady may not cross the Channel. Meanwhile for the young composer prepared to give the world—not Strauss-and-water or Debussy-au-lait—but something new and original of his own, which the world will really like, there surely never was such an opportunity as the present.

The unexpected collapse of the German opera season at Covent Garden has caused natural surprise and probably not a little disappointment, but under all the circumstances the management were doubtless wise. It was, perhaps, a mistake to have extended the performances originally beyond the date first announced. As a whole the season has certainly reflected great credit on all concerned, and it may be trusted that any little disappointments which may have been experienced in this respect or that will not avail to prevent the promoters from trying their hands again next year. Only in one respect has there been cause for serious criticism, namely, in regard to the quality of some of the singing. But the management were hardly to blame for this, seeing that they did their best to secure the finest artists available. The misfortune is that in the case of German vocalists good singers are so hard to find. But against any shortcomings under this head must be set the all-round excellence of the performances and the splendid orchestral playing which has been heard—notably at the three performances directed by Herr Nikisch.

In consequence of the premature conclusion of the season Nikolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was revived, as it turned out, for one performance only—a fact to be regretted, as the work contains some delightful music and deserved a better fate. Perhaps it may be found possible to give it later, during the Grand season.

We get too little in the way of music of the lighter and more genial order at Covent Garden, and though this of Nikolai now sounds a trifle old-fashioned in places there is such warmth and melody and fragrance about its happiest pages that its more conventional features are readily overlooked. It had the advantage, too, on this occasion, of being capitally presented, with Herr Max Lohfing in the principal part. This is a German vocalist who can really sing, and his success was undeniable.

Among recent concerts that of the Queen's Hall Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon drew once more an enormous audience—attracted, doubtless, in considerable measure by the presence of Herr Kreisler, who played superbly as ever in Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Another feature of the programme was Stanford's second Irish rhapsody, which had not previously been given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra. On the same afternoon, at the Bechstein Hall, Mme. Carreño delighted her followers in an admirably chosen programme. Eminent pianists have, indeed, been much in evidence just lately. Herr Emil Sauer, Mr. Leonard Borwick, and M. Jacques Pintel were others heard earlier in the week. On Wednesday the Royal Choral Society did "The Dream of Gerontius" at the Albert Hall, which is really too large for a work of such intimacy of feeling, and on the same evening Mr. Donald Tovey gave a very enjoyable chamber concert at the Chelsea Town Hall, with the assistance of that unparagoned clarinettist, Herr Mühlfeld.

On Friday the King and Prince of Wales were both present, along with other notables, at the smoking concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society. The London Symphony Orchestra's concert on Monday brought forward a novelty in Sir A. C. Mackenzie's new violin suite, which proved, however, rather disappointing, though brilliantly played as to its exacting solo part by Mischa Elman.

The announcement that M. Edouard de Reszke is starting a singing class in London on similar lines to those followed by his brother, M. Jean de Reszke, in Paris, is interesting. From some particulars supplied in the Tribune, which is always well served as to its musical intelligence, it seems that he is acting on the advice of his brother in coming to London. Pupils will only be accepted for a complete course of twenty lessons, either privately or in classes not exceeding three in number, and in every detail the system of teaching will be identical with that pursued in Paris. The fees asked will naturally be high, but there will doubtless be any number ready to pay them for the privilege of receiving instruction at the hands of such a past master of the art of bel canto as M. Edouard de Reszke. It is getting on for thirty years now since M. de Reszke made his début in opera, though his voice is said to be still almost as fine as ever. But he has no intention of returning to the stage.

The New York criticisms of "Salome" now to hand make lively reading. Mr. H. T. Finck in the Evening Post was pungent as usual:—

> If the presentation of such a story is ethically a crime Richard Strauss's music is æsthetically criminal—or, at least, extremely coarse and ill-mannered. His music often suggests a man who comes to a social reception, unkempt, with hands unwashed, cigar in mouth, hat on, and who sits down and puts his feet on the table. No boor ever violated all the laws of etiquette as Strauss violates all the laws of musical composition.

The New York Evening Journal, in an article which has been ascribed to Mr. Hearst's famous journalistic bravo, Mr. Brisbane, was even more frank:—

> What would you say of a man of genius if he collected beautiful white lilies, arranged them beautifully, and on top of them placed a dead and putrid toad for the world to look at? That is what Strauss has done, that is what those who produce "Salome" are doing.

Other critics say the same sort of thing in less picturesque language, but it is noteworthy that nearly all agree in recognising the marvellous descriptive force and expressive power of Strauss's music.

Meanwhile, it is announced from Berlin that "Salome's" successor, "Elektra," is nearing completion. The text of this, according to the Morning Leader, has been adapted by the composer from the play of the Viennese poet, Hugo von Hoffmannsthal, whose literary style is said to bear a curious similarity to that of Oscar Wilde. Strauss and Sophocles should certainly make a piquant blend.

A composer held in great esteem by many has passed away at the early age of forty-six in the person of Ludwig Thuille. Although few of his works have been heard in England, they have long enjoyed much favour in Germany. In Munich especially, where he was a professor at the Academy, Thuille had an extensive following. Apart from his operas, Thuille's music was mostly of the "absolute" order. The modern tendency in the direction of programme music was one with which he had little sympathy. Of his dramatic works, the most successful was "Lobetanz," an opera which was given at one time all over Germany.

Much regret has been caused in musical circles by the death of Mr. Vernon Blackburn, the well-known critic of the Pall Mall Gazette and other journals. For some years past he had been in indifferent health, but his numerous friends were none the less shocked last week to learn of his sadly premature decease. Mr. Blackburn was not, perhaps, a great critic, but he wrote very picturesquely and in a manner all his own on musical matters. A memorable incident in his career was the famous protest signed by various eminent musicians and addressed to the Pall Mall Gazette on the subject of one of his notices of a Bach Choir performance, which they regarded as misleading and unfair. In the result, however, they hardly gained much by their action. On the contrary, the Pall Mall Gazette vigorously maintained the position of its critic, and a nine days' controversy left the latter more firmly established in his post than before. But this, of course, is all ancient history now, and Mr. Blackburn had long since made friends with most of his former assailants. Personally Mr. Blackburn was a man of a most amiable and generous disposition. He leaves a widow, with whom sympathy will be general.

Congratulations will be general to that excellent artist, Miss Gleeson White, on the announcement of her engagement. During the last few years Miss Gleeson White has made many friends in the concert-room as principal soprano at the leading festivals and elsewhere, while she has also appeared at Covent Garden, where, it may be hoped, with her fine voice, good presence, and high intelligence, she may go still further yet.

Interesting particulars are given by the Musical News of a proposed Orlando Gibbons festival to be held at Westminster Abbey on Wednesday, June 5, the anniversary of Gibbons' death in 1625. This is being promoted, it seems, by the Worshipful Company of Musicians, on the initiative of Mr. C. T. D. Crews, one of the past Masters of the Company, and it should certainly prove an event of interest to musicians. Gibbons is one of those worthies whose reputations stand in inverse ratio to the general knowledge of their music, and such a performance as that projected should help to remedy to some extent this condition of affairs.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—The explanation Socrates gave of Alcibiades' failure as a traveller, "that he took himself with him," is the explanation also of the failure of many books of travel by Englishmen. The Englishman generally takes himself with him and sees all things therefore only from the outside, and all things therefore partially in both senses of the word—especially the East, whether the Far or Near East. The East can be no more intelligibly seen from the outside than can the stained glass window of a cathedral. You must stand inside the temple and as a sympathetic wor-shipper there before you can even perceive either any beauty or any significance in the colours and figures presented to you. What holds generally true, however, of an English male traveller in the East, is not applicable to an adventurous lady, since the sympathy and intuition of the sex come here to her aid; and it is chiefly this sympathy and intuition, together with her knowledge of the modern Syrian Arabic tongue, which make Miss Lowthian Bell's "The Desert and the Sown" (1) the very best book of Eastern travel I have read for many a year. The fine coloured frontispiece by Sargent, representing Bedouins of the Syrian Desert, suggests the faithfulness and picturesqueness with which Miss Lowthian Bell has caught and reproduced the colour and character of her Eastern subjects. By the way, her book is illustrated by numberless and admirable photographs of temples and castles, ruins and relics (hitherto un-photographed) of the highest antiquarian, archæological and artistic interest. But Miss Lowthian Bell's interests are far from being exclusively archæological or antiquarian. She has a keen eye for the political situation of the moment, and especially for the mutual political relations of England and Turkey, which are far from satisfactory at present. We have wholly lost our former strong reputation and position as regards Turkey, in part through our unwillingness to interfere officially, and in part through our permission of vehemently expressed non-official and sentimental protests. Hence "our dealings with the Turk have presented an air of vacillation which he may be pardoned for considering perfidious." Miss Lowthian Bell is at pains to correct a preposterous European impression of Turkey as a homogeneous empire—as preposterous as to suppose that the term England included with the United Kingdom India, the Shan States, Hongkong, and Uganda.

> In the sense of a land inhabited mainly by Turks there is no such country as Turkey. The parts of his dominion where the Turk is in a majority are few; generally his position is that of an alien governing with a handful of soldiers and an empty purse a mixed collection of subjects hostile to him and to each other.

As the Turk has no knowledge of the language and no sympathy with the religious or political ideas of these subjects, he can hardly be blamed for enforcing drastically law and order—of which he has himself the strongest sense—amongst the contending factions. At any rate, the Turkish rule is an improvement upon that it superseded in Hamah, to judge by one tale told by Miss Lowthian Bell. One of its former rulers, coveting, like King David, his neighbour's vineyard, which its owner declined to sell, caused a slave to be slaughtered, cut up into mince-meat, and buried in a corner of the coveted ground. Having waited till he felt assured that decomposition had well set in, he notified the contumacious owner of the vineyard that he would do him the honour to drink coffee with him in his garden. The man, delighted at the condescension of his prince, made all haste to receive him worthily in an arbour. "Not here," objected the prince. "Pray, remove to there," pointing to the spot where the minced-up slave had been buried. "But that is a refuse heap," objected the host. "I have taken a fancy to that spot," replied the prince—a fancy, however, which did not last long. "What a stench!" cried the prince. "I told you, my lord, it was a refuse heap." "It is not the smell of refuse," rejoined the prince sternly. "I must have this looked into"; and he bade his attendants dig. When the chopped-up body was exhumed, the prince charged Naboth with the murder, and appropriated all his possessions, including the garden, as compensation for the loss of his slave. Miss Lowthian Bell confirms the apparent miracle to which a hundred other Eastern travellers have testified, of the instantaneous transmission of news from one corner of Asia to the other. Nor is the interest in this news political, or what we should call patriotic.

> Islam is the bond that unites the western and central parts of the continent, and there is little or no sense of territorial nationality to counterbalance the religious sentiment. A Turk or a Persian or a Syrian does not think of my country in the way that an Englishman or a Frenchman thinks. His patriotism is confined to the town of which he is a native, or at most to the district in which that town lies.

England, therefore, as the greatest of all Mohammedan Powers, has most to win or lose by these rumours that flash across Asia as the lightning that lightens out of the east to the west. It is satisfactory, therefore, to learn from Miss Lowthian Bell that:—

> For the moment the name of the English carries more weight than it has done for some time. I noticed a very distinct difference between the general attitude towards us from that which I had observed with pain five years before, during the worst moments of the Boer War. The change of feeling is due not so much to our victory in South Africa as to Lord Cromer's brilliant administration in Egypt, Lord Curzon's policy on the Persian Gulf, and the alliance with the conquering Japanese.

If you have read and enjoyed—and who has not?—Mrs. Earle's "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden," you will welcome as the fourth of a charming series, "Letters to Young and Old" (2). I turned first to the letters on gardening, assured here that the treatment would be worthy at once of the writer and of the subject, nor was I disappointed. But, indeed, there is not a disappointing page in the whole delightful volume; while the few distasteful letters—to meat-eaters and tea-drinkers—are like the medicines of our childhood, as wholesome as they are distasteful. Mrs. Earle might have added to her cento of excellently chosen quotations one of Sydney Smith's three rules for happiness:—"Note the effects of tea and coffee upon you." By "The Fighting Chance" (3), Mr. Robert Chambers, an American novelist, will certainly secure here the success he has already achieved in his own country. By the way, I wonder if his success in his own country guarantees the faithfulness of his unpleasant pictures of his countrymen—at least of the "Four Hundred." They confirm the Miltonic view of Mammon—that even in Hell there was no meaner spirit. The other moral of the novel is anti-Spencerian, since it proves that both in the hero's and in the heroine's case there is a fair fighting chance against the influence of heredity. The hero inherited the curse of drink and the heroine the tendency to illicit love, and each helps the other to an ultimate triumph over their congenital inheritance. It is a little paradoxical that the Americans, the most practical folk in the world, should be, as their popular songs and novels testify, also the most sentimental; but the sentiment in "The Fighting Chance," though occasionally gushing, is never mawkish.

There is an ever-recurring contrast between the style and the subject of Mr. Jack London's "White Fang" (4). You do not expect in an extraordinarily vivid story of a dog fight, either with his kind or with other creatures, fine writing appropriate to an ethereal love romance. On the other hand, when Mr. Jack London is writing simply he is unsurpassed in the wonderful vigour and vividness of his descriptions. In this history of the evolution of a soul in a dog he has, so to say, condensed the history of the development of the species from the original wolf, wild dog, or jackal to the faithfullest of all the friends of man. A finer or more fascinating story of its kind has seldom been written than this history of the evolution of a dog's soul. Very clever indeed is Mr. Sidney Paternoster's "The Folly of the Wise" (5), whose heroine makes first a nauseating marriage of convenience to an old man, and is later indemnified by her union with the hero, who had had the good fortune to save her life. The interval of suspense between the revolting and enchanting marriages is filled up ingeniously with the usual misunderstandings—more than usually malignant—and your interest is kept at a high level throughout.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Lady Dorothy Nevill, whose volume of "Reminiscences" was one of the great successes of the autumn publishing season, is engaged upon a further volume of recollections, which, like the first, will be edited by her son, Mr. Ralph Nevill. It will be issued by Messrs. Macmillan in October next.

General Baden-Powell's "Sketches in Mafeking and East Africa" will be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., on March 12. It is a collection of sketches drawn by General Baden-Powell during the siege of Mafeking, with other illustrations of his recent journey to the Victoria Fall and to Lake Victoria Nyanza and Uganda viâ the East Coast. The accompanying letterpress gives numerous personal incidents of the siege and a rough journal of the author's travels and shooting in British East Africa.

The pure undiluted gospel of Toryism which Mr. A. C. Fox-Davies expounds in his pamphlet on "The House of Lords" (John Lane, 1s. net) will amuse every Radical. Whether it will be relished by people of his own way of thinking is another question. He frankly avows opinions which they deem it more discreet to conceal. He regards the notion that the British Parliament should represent "the will of the people" as unutterable rubbish. His theory of the House of Lords is that its sole duty is to safeguard the big material interests it represents; the idea that it should act as a mere second chamber, a check upon ill-considered legislation, is a miserable subterfuge, a pusillanimous abandonment of its true and logical and constitutional place and status. Mr. Fox-Davies is a vigorous and vivacious writer, and his "political tract" is well worth reading.

Mr. Edward Arnold will have ready immediately two books on Africa. The first, "A Picnic Party in Wildest Africa," by C. W. L. Bulfett, is a record of an expedition organised by Mr. McMillan, the American traveller, for the purpose of exploring the country lying between the river Akobo and Lake Rudolph. The other book, "Tippoo Tib," is a translation of a work by Dr. Brode, German Consul at Zanzibar, who induced the notorious Central African adventurer to write an account of his life, and has built up from it a picture of the gradual transition of Africa in the hands of the white man.

Mr. Frank A. Martin's "Under the Absolute Amir" (Harper and Brothers, price 10s. 6d.) has made an opportune appearance during the visit of the ruler of Afghanistan to India. Both the present Amir, Habibullah, and his predecessor, Abdur Rahman, figure prominently in the volume, which is the outcome of Mr. Martin's residence in Cabul for eight years as engineer-in-chief to the Government. He gives a most interesting and instructive account of the country and the people, of the characters of the two Ameers in whose service he was, and of the methods and the barbarities of their administration.

Lady Rosalind Northcote has written a book on "Devonshire: its Moorlands, Streams, and Coast," which will be illustrated after water-colours by Mr. James Widgery. The book will be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus.

Mr. Everard Cotes's forthcoming work on the China and Japan of to-day and to-morrow, entitled "Signs and Portents in the Far East," will be published by Messrs. Methuen. It embodies the author's observations of men and things during a prolonged tour in Manchuria and the East, and among other matters he examines the capabilities of the new Chinese army and the limits imposed by race characteristics upon the situation which has arisen since the Russo-Japanese war.

A new novel by S. R. Crockett, entitled "Little Esson," is announced by Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. It is described as a story of the sorrows and smiles of which domestic comedy is made up in modern life.

The Marquis of Ruvigny continues with tireless industry the compilation of his monumental work, "The Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal." The new volume (just published by Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack, price four guineas), traces the lineage of no fewer than 25,052 living (or very lately living) descendants of Anne (Plantagenet) Duchess of Exeter, the eldest sister of Edward IV. The list comprises persons in every station of life, and one can imagine that a volume showing that they are sprung from the Plantagenets will be a source of joy to many of them.

The 1907 volume of "Sell's Directory of Registered Telegraphic Addresses" has just been published by Mr. Henry Sell at 166, Fleet-street, E.C. Besides containing a complete record of the telegraphic addresses registered at the Post Office, the book now gives upwards of 20,000 foreign and colonial cable addresses, while it also forms a unique directory of the largest commercial houses in the United Kingdom. Another very useful feature for firms doing an export trade is a complete list of British Consuls in foreign countries. To commercial and professional men having occasion to transact business by wire the volume is indispensable, and those who are annual subscribers have the advantage of receiving free of charge quarterly supplements giving the latest new registrations, alterations, etc.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Two or three cases of nervous breakdown having occurred in our little circle lately, I have had it borne in upon me that it is not work that makes such ruinous drafts upon health and strength, but the want of a playground for one's thoughts. If a business man works all day, putting the whole of his energies into whatever he is doing, he ought to be able to switch off his thoughts and turn them on to something whereon they may pasture pleasantly. To some men, home, wife, and children are the playground. For others there is some special hobby which is their salvation, saving them from that iterant and reiterant monotony that belongs to business of most kinds. A great doctor once said that every man should have a hobby—and every woman, too, I suppose? But we have more inward resources than men. Do you not think so? Men are often restless, and hate sitting still, unless they are fond of reading. Women do not object to being quiet and passing a tranquil evening at home. That is, of course, if their hearts are in their homes.

Carpentering is a hobby of several men we know. They have a workroom set apart for them, and their joy is in getting new tools for their work. I know one man who has made beautiful furniture for his dining-room, doing the whole work after business hours. He is an architect. Another has beautified his wife's drawing-room with fanciful cabinets, bookcases, a writing-table, brackets, and an overmantel, all in some white wood, which is enamelled to match the Rose Dubarry walls. The room is a picture, with its Aubusson carpet, old Chippendale and Sheraton chairs, painted piano, and soft easy chairs with pink silk cushions. The lamps have all pink shades, and there are rosy screens here and there, which are a joy to the eyes of those who turn in from the bleak grey streets at teatime.

Another man we know is a collector of many kinds of rare things: china, old silver, pictures, curios from all parts of the world. No fear of his ever breaking down from overwork, for the playground of his thoughts is wide and breezy.

Then there is Minta, who works so hard at philanthropy—a most wearing occupation. She did break down once, and her sensible doctor said to her: "Are you fond of gardening? Then get a garden and play in it," or words to that effect. She took his advice, and has never shown a sign of breakdown since. The garden and the little cottage that stands in it, as a cup in a saucer, give her thoughts abundant recreation. She says she has two distinct lives, one being sunk in her work, the other a butterfly existence spent wholly in her garden. "Even when I am up here in London," she remarked, one day, "my thoughts are circumambulating among the paths, and I sometimes wonder if the gardener ever fancies that he sees me, I being in imagination so strongly present there."

What a jump it would give the poor man! I have often had the same idea, though. When we were abroad last spring I found I had forgotten a key belonging to our luggage, and one evening when I was thinking hard about the spot where I felt sure I had left it, and was in imagination standing in front of the wardrobe in my room at home, I felt certain that at that very moment Richard opened the door and looked in. It was a curious sensation. He was not with us on our Tyrol trip, and I have often wondered if he really did look into the room at that moment when the real I was so strongly there, though not in the body.

I have never asked him. He would certainly think me quite mad if I were to do so!

We were at such a very pretty wedding last week. The bride, a tall, slight, graceful girl, with immense dark eyes, quantities of dark hair, a brilliant colour, red lips, and pretty white teeth, a beauty of a Spanish type, wore the loveliest gown I have seen for a long time. It was satin, so skilfully made that the folds clung around her, now catching the light, now showing deep pearl tones in the shadows. A Medicis collar in lace and pearls was curved back from the shoulders, and just below it was lace that made me suddenly whisper to myself, "Oh, do remember the Tenth Commandment!" The bridal veil was fine old lace and was very gracefully arranged over sprays of orange blossom in the dark hair.

The bridesmaids wore very charming gowns of softest pale pink silk, the bodice trimmed with velvet in a rather deeper tone arranged in a new and picturesque way. A small page and a tiny girl in Sir Joshua costumes of white satin carried the bride's train. When the happy pair had advanced and knelt at the altar the scene was so pretty that it might have been arranged by some clever and experienced colourist. The bridesmaids stood apart at either side, allowing the congregation to see the bride and bridegroom (a great improvement on the ordinary plan of standing immediately behind them), and the small boy and girl were pleasant items in the picture. At one moment the vivid crimson of the clergyman's hood made a telling bit of colour and the high arch formed across the entrance to the chancel by tall palms framed in the whole. You can scarcely imagine, without having seen, how very pretty it was, all lit up, too, by the bright electric light.

At the reception everything was equally artistic. Tall lilies made a guard of honour on the stairs, one rising from every baluster. The chimney-pieces bore clusters of white flowers arranged in groups as though growing, and above them drooping smilax from the overmantels with lilies here and there.

Some professor has been telling the world that blue-rayed individuals have no affinity with others who are red-rayed, and that a man or woman who takes a matrimonial partner whose rays are of the wrong colour is sure to be unhappy. Now why has that sage professor led us thus far on the road to happiness and not taken us the whole way? Why has he not told us how to discover the colour of the rays by which (he says) we are surrounded? How very incomplete some systems of philosophy are! If this professor could but start a laboratory in which the rays of man or woman would be visible directly they entered, what a boon it would be to the world! and think what a huge fortune he would make—beyond the dreams of avarice. One can imagine an engaged couple entering in a tumultuously happy frame of mind and after a few moments rushing out and violently parting for ever on the doorstep or somewhere in the street, having discovered that one was blue-rayed, the other red.

Helen has just taken a flat in partnership with another lonely widow whose circumstances are in many ways similar to Helen's own. How useful it would have been to call in at such a laboratory, pay the professor's fee, and discover if there were a compatibility of colour-rays. But we have all to grope along in the dark, so long as this learned man may delay in carrying out his investigations to some practical end. Would it be of any use for us to write and beg of him to hurry up?

We were at an interesting debate at the Pioneers' Club last week. The subject was "That Bernard Shaw is justified in eliminating romance from his plays." Mr. Osman Edwards opened the debate, and gave us the narrowest definition of romance to argue on that he could, thus tacitly admitting that a wider proposition would have been untenable. Fierce and earnest ran the debate on whether romance in the sense of a "love-interest" ought to be left out or not. Miss Hughes, who opposed, said in a witty speech that Bernard Shaw was not fit to handle romance, and therefore would be quite "justified in eliminating it from his plays"—but did not, squeezing it in "in stupid little love-scenes." After that the evening was one of great intentness, varied by much laughter. One lady said she had travelled in many countries, but she had never met people "one least bit like any of Bernard Shaw's." An uncompromising disciple announced, after much denunciation of G. B. S.'s women from the opposers, that he was perfectly right; women were schemers, and they had pursued man since the Garden of Eden—a serious opinion which was received with peals of laughter and not a few "Good gracious!"-es.

The end of it all was so exactly like a G. B. S. situation that we have smiled ever since over it. The "ayes" had it; he was quite justified in eliminating romance from his plays; and every one of those ayes admitted that he had not eliminated it, and, indeed, at one period of the evening, the supporters of the proposition were engaged in an earnest eulogy of G. B. S. as a great romantic writer! We were struck by the clearness and conciseness of the speakers, all but two of whom were women, and many of them were witty as well as wise. We had been so afraid, for the credit of our sex, that Mr. Osman Edwards's opening was so brilliant that we should not be able to return a Roland for his Oliver. Bee and I only wished that G. B. S. could have been there himself, for he does not say more opposite things about one of his own characters than were said of him; the image of him evoked challenged comparison with a dozen different great men, of course, including Shakespeare; but never faltered from its Shawishness.

Lady Ludlow is to open on March 14 the thirty-seventh annual sale of the original society for selling work done by ladies in reduced circumstances. Established in 1871 by some ladies of means, this may be called the eldest sister of those that have sprung up since. The work is so quietly, unobtrusively, and inexpensively carried on that it runs some risk of being overlooked. The hon. secretary, Miss Green, 136, Alexandra-road, N.W., receives work done by poor gentlewomen in all parts of the United Kingdom, and the sale is held every spring and occupies two days. It is a good deed to go and buy, nor does it involve any particular self-sacrifice, since the work is beautiful and moderately priced. The Hampstead Conservatoire, Eton-avenue, close to Swiss Cottage, is the scene of the sale on the two days, and a very convenient arrangement is made by which visitors can have cold luncheon or tea at moderate cost. As these refreshments are a gift to the society, the full receipts go towards the expenses of the sale.

What makes this society so beneficent to the workers is that no commission is charged them. Each one receives in full the amount realised by her work, and the cost of membership is just 1s. per annum. Orders for needlework of any kind are gratefully received. Do send your next purchase of table linen or handkerchiefs there to have your initials embroidered on them. I wish a thousand people would. The class benefited by this society is, to my idea, the most to be pitied of any, and, alas! some of the members are crippled or invalids.

The name you have forgotten is Glyciduline—the address, Reeve, chemist, Birmingham. It is really wonderful stuff, and I, for one, owe many a good night's rest to it, especially in such trying weather as we have been having. Do not dilute it too freely when your throat is relaxed or when you have a teasing cough. It is a mixture of glycerine and something like concentrated lemon juice, agreeable to the palate; highly superior in this way to some of the remedies of a flavour so frightful that one almost prefers to go on coughing rather than annoy one's palate with anything so atrocious. I recommended the Glyciduline to an old lady who was harassed by a most distressing cough both night and day. After two or three doses she was completely relieved, and always says she can never sufficiently thank me for having told her about it. She makes me feel quite a benefactress—a very pleasant sensation!

I have received the following from Mona:—

MY DEAR MADGE,—I thank you for your good wishes. We are making some progress, though it is but slow. Strange as it may seem to you, the Prevention of Corruption Act may help us. When we first started this little business we thought we had only to grow good plants to sell them. We were soon undeceived. One of our earliest customers was a lady, living about twelve miles away, who sent her gardener and another man in a cart to fetch the plants she had ordered. The gardener told me that the other man wanted some money for his dinner. I pretended not to hear. Then he informed me that his mistress was very rich and would give us large orders if satisfied with the plants, and concluded by asking for what he called "the usual commission." I emphatically refused to give him a farthing. We have never had another order from this lady. The gardener, as we have since discovered, neglected the plants supplied by us, and in consequence most of them proved failures. You may consider this an exceptional experience, but it is unfortunately a very common one. The practice of demanding money from nurserymen is almost universal among gardeners, among head gardeners especially. It is sometimes called commission and sometimes discount, but whatever the name, it rightfully belongs to the employer, for though the nurseryman pays it in the first instance, he is bound to take it into consideration when fixing the price. You may think it unlikely that firms of good standing would countenance anything of the sort, but it is impossible that they should be ignorant of what is going on, except perhaps where, as often happens, their travellers say to a gardener, "If you give me an order, I will divide my commission with you." In a letter which I received some time ago from a member of one of the largest firms in the kingdom, he admitted the evil, and said that all efforts to remove it had failed because horticultural firms would not combine. It had, therefore, become almost compulsory to bribe. I know of one gentleman who, after having made a hobby of the finest bulbs, tried for years to start a business in them, but, after spending a great deal of money, was compelled to give it up, simply because he refused to be a party to what he justly called swindling. To some extent, perhaps, it is the employers' own fault. If they leave the ordering of their plants and seeds entirely to others, they must expect to pay through the nose. I suppose owners of large gardens, perhaps several gardens in different parts of the country, cannot well help themselves, but others would be well advised if they gave their orders themselves. The Prevention of Corruption Act may effect some improvement. That it will completely smash up a system so deep-rooted and so widespread is too much to hope for, but it will at least prevent open demands for commission or discount. For that reason, we think it will help us a little.

If, as it must do, it reduces the expenses of horticultural firms, it should benefit the public by bringing about a general reduction in prices. In order to supply some justification for the high level at which they have hitherto been maintained, packets of seeds have been made far larger than is necessary for ordinary gardens. If this were merely waste it would be bad enough, but it is much worse. For, with the idea of preventing the waste, all the seeds are sown in an area in which not a tenth of the plants can grow, with the result that most, if not all, of them are spoilt. "To give a practical illustration of the results of overcrowding," says a horticultural writer, "place a single seed of a mignonette in the ground, and the seedling will spread into a mass a foot or 15in. across, covered with fine spikes; but allow thirty seeds in the same space and the outcome is deplorable." Yet thick sowing is the commonest of all mistakes in the garden, and for it the excessively large packets of seed sold by most seedsmen at a correspondingly high price must be held responsible. Sweet peas supply a striking example. They are usually crowded so close together that they are an impenetrable tangle of stems, and in consequence the flowers are poor in quality and comparatively few in number. A single plant, properly grown, would cover more space than a dozen of them, and would produce more and finer flowers for a much longer time. Try some of the new varieties 18in. apart, and you will be astonished how well they do. Those that I specially recommend are Countess Spencer, the best pink; Henry Eckford, the best orange; Paradise, the best rose, with beautifully waved petals; Dorothy Eckford, the best white; King Edward VII., the best crimson; Navy Blue, the best blue; Helen Lewis, with large, waved, orange standard and rose-coloured wings; and the Hon. Mrs. E. Kenyon, pale yellow. Of course, there are many other beautiful varieties, some of them differing but slightly from those I have named, but these seven would be very difficult to beat.

You told me last year that you had never grown cannas; I strongly advise you to do so. With their handsome leaves and gorgeous flowers, they are magnificent for either pots or beds. You can buy the tuberous roots if you like—they are not expensive—or you can raise the plants from seed in the greenhouse. But the seed should be sown at once, or you will not get good flowers the same year. It is something like a sweet pea in shape, but excessively hard—so hard that germination often takes months unless it is facilitated by scratching the outer skin with a file and afterwards soaking the seed for twenty-four hours in hot water. Cannas are easy enough to grow: their chief requirements are rich soil, plenty of moisture, and a fairly high temperature. In June they may be planted outside. If wanted for conservatory decoration, they should be moved into large pots. They will keep on throwing up fresh flowering stems all summer, but when colder weather comes growth will cease. This should be the signal to reduce the supply of moisture. When the stems wither they may be cut away, and the pots containing the tubers stored away for the winter under the greenhouse stage—on their sides, so as to keep the soil dry.—Your affectionate cousin, MONA.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—The beginning of Lent last week brought, as it always brings, a very short interlude in the Castle season, a pause in the social whirl. There was time to think for any who had a turn that way, and to take up the less frivolous works and interests, neglected in the rush of society engagements; time for our friends in particular, and, above all, time for ourselves for dallying with life and tasting the hours appreciatingly, instead of just swallowing them down, as one does an influenza cachet. In "rushing" life might one not be any one else just as well as one's self, so little opportunity do individuality and special tastes get? One does what the others are doing, simply because they are doing it without any reference to the why and the wherefore.

The interval only began on Wednesday, entertainments being given at the Castle, both on Monday and Tuesday evenings. Lady Aberdeen, owing to a slight cold, was not present at either of them, but Lord Aberdeen was zealously assisted by his family and staff in doing the honours. Never was there a more active viceregal staff than the present one. Thirteen aides-de-camp, as well as a great number of civilian household officials, and all just as much for use as for ornament, which says a great deal. "Like master, like man," and what host at Dublin Castle was ever more gracious and pleasing than Lord Aberdeen? No wonder those who are asked to the parties—the dances in especial—enjoy them, and still less wonder that those who are not asked suffer much vexation of spirit. You can imagine how pleasant for the guests it is to have so many hosts, as it were, solicitous for their enjoyment. Pretty faces and pretty frocks were pleasantly predominant at the dance on Monday evening, the guests numbered several hundreds, and all the state rooms were thrown open. Lord and Lady Grenfell were not present, on account of Lady Victoria Grenfell's death. They left the Royal Hospital at the beginning of the week, to attend her funeral in England. The news of Lady Cadogan's death cast a gloom over the entertainment to some extent. She had many friends in Ireland. Her bright and charming personality and her kindly manner, the outward expression of a kindly heart, made her perhaps the most popular viceregal chatelaine of Dublin Castle of late years. There is so much in manner! So many who are kindly in intention, are, in a way, dumb with regard to giving open expression to their kindliness. Small blame to us if we do not recognise that a bad manner alone is a fault. We fallible mortals from whom hearts are hidden have more or less to judge by what is shown. And so we are easily won by the hearts whose kindliness is expressive and what might be called articulate. On Tuesday evening a concert was given in St. Patrick's Hall, at which also there were many hundreds of viceregal guests. To the young and frivolous—not necessarily only the young—these entertainments are not very attractive; they have their charms, however, for those who like music, and can dissociate enjoyment from activity.

This week the interval ends; another "Court" will be held on Wednesday. Their Excellencies will entertain another party of viceregal visitors. Lord Hawkesbury's father, Lord Liverpool, is still seriously ill; the Chamberlain was absent from the Castle last week in England. Sir Antony MacDonnell was in London for the opening of Parliament and other business, but no doubt will return to wield the sword of State at the Levee and Court this week. The Chief Secretary will hardly be able to take up his residence in the Phœnix Park for a long time to come, but is expected to spend Easter there, though hardly to have a holiday time. Since sympathy came into fashion with Chief Secretaries in Ireland there is no more rest for them than for the "pilgrim of love" in the old song. We are looking forward to Mr. Birrell, and with pleasant anticipations. Those of us who read—not, it must be said, the largest section of society—have happy associations with his name, through his graceful and cheering writings. And then we all like a new high official, as giving us something new to criticise. We are deeply disappointed that the King is not to visit Ireland in May; we were in hopes that the Sovereign and Royalty in general would get into the way of going about this island of the kingdom as about the other countries and with the same freedom. As a matter of fact, there is no safer country in the world for Royalty than ours. Amongst our many departments we have not one as yet for Anarchists, nor even for Suffragettes.

Lady Keane, whose death occurred so sadly on the eve of her son's marriage, was a well known member of Irish society, a clever woman of high culture. She was very popular in the country amongst all classes. Her father, Mr. J. Vance, was in the old days the well-known Conservative member for the City of Dublin, and her mother was one of the handsomest women of her time.—Yours ever, CLARE.

Here is another Lenten recipe for you: fillets of soles à la Viola:—

Trim the fillets of a pair of soles, season them with salt, pepper, and lemon juice, roll each fillet round some cork-shaped pieces of potato, dipped in liquid butter, fasten them round with thread, and arrange them in a buttered stewpan, moisten them with a little fish stock, and cook them ten minutes, with a buttered paper over them. Remove them to cool, then take out the potato, and fill the cavity with chopped lobster, mixed with sauce and the yolk of an egg. Roll the sole first in bread crumbs, then in beaten egg and bread crumbs, and fry them in a bath of hot lard. Dish the fish in a circle, with scallops of lobster in the centre, and the remainder of the sauce poured round them.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

READY TO-DAY.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A HUMOURIST.

By A. W. à BECKETT

(For more than twenty years Assistant Editor of "Punch").

In Demy 8vo, Crash Gilt, Gilt Top,
With Portrait in Photogravure,

12/6 net.

The grave and gay reminiscences of a writer whose experiences have been of an unusually varied character. By turns a Civil Servant, a War Correspondent, an Editor, a Novelist, Mr. à Beckett has played many parts. His eight-and-twenty years' work on the staff of "Punch," of which he became assistant editor, would by itself supply a goodly store of reminiscences, but he has had many other sources to draw from, and his stories relate to a great diversity of names known to the reader in literature, or art, or—in a word—the general social life of the last forty years.

TWO GREAT CONTROVERSIAL NOVELS

AMAZEMENT By James Blyth 6s.

The opinion of the PALL MALL GAZETTE:—"'Amazement' by its title but faintly expresses the emotions with which it will be read. By the marriage law reformer it will be welcomed as a brilliant yet scathing indictment of the existing system, and apart from its motive, the critical must admit the richness of its humour, its faithfulness to life, and its sound literary quality. Mr. Blyth has never produced work which is cleverer. The character drawing and character contrasts betray unusual skill and finished artistry. Mr. Blyth has built up a strong case for the reform of our marriage and divorce laws, and 'Amazement' must be regarded as one of the strongest novels of the season."

THE YOKE By Hubert Wales

Author of "Mr. and Mrs. Villiers." 6s.

This week's Tatler says: "What I said about 'Mr. and Mrs. Villiers' some months ago I repeat about 'The Yoke.' But the latter is more than a 'notable book'; it is one of striking skill both in plot and characterisation, and assures Mr. Hubert Wales that front-rank place among contemporary novelists for which he has made so bold a bid. There is no inane idealism about 'The Yoke.' Its intense human interest will be the key to its success."

1. THE HOUSE OF A THOUSAND CANDLES

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON.
FOURTH EDITION NOW READY. Price 6s.

Truth.—"The reader's attention is not allowed to relax until 'Finis' is written."

Star.—"The plot is almost impregnably clever. You cannot guess the secret till very near the end. The perilous position of the hero is very cheering. You feel that he is bound to be killed on every page. The fight in the dark between him and Morgan is very soothing. I like the thought of two men crawling in a gloomy subterranean corridor and firing revolvers at each other. It must be quite exciting. You could not know what moment would be the next. The other complications in this lively book are very ingenious, and on the whole I think it is the finest novel of pure sensation we have had for years."

Literary World.—"The dénouement is unique, and will, we venture to suppose, never be guessed by the most experienced reader. The book is brightly written, and the interest never fails."

2. MR. PRATT By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY. Price 6s.

Daily Telegraph says:—"For those healthy people who like to laugh when they read, this is a book that may be heartily recommended."

3. SEEING FRANCE WITH UNCLE JOHN

Numerous Illustrations by M. W. PRESTON.

Yorkshire Post.—"Not since Jerome's 'Three Men in a Boat' do we remember a more amusing tale of travel."

Telegraph.—"Described with rare humour . . . decidedly entertaining."

Notts Guardian.—"A rollicking, laughable book, appealing to the same sense of humour as Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad' . . . the work gains immensely from the clever illustrations."

"These remarkably 'indiscreet' letters are more exciting than ninety-nine novels out of a hundred. They contain the full story of the siege and sack of the city in all its horrible nakedness, without regard for the feelings of anybody connected with the campaign."—Daily Graphic.

"The writer roughly drags aside the veil which a discreet diplomacy had drawn over the truth, and gives us . . . a book remarkable alike for its sincerity, its dramatic power, and its amazing indiscretion. The lurid account here given of the sack of Peking by the allied armies is an appalling revelation of the demoralisation into which the troops fell."—Morning Post.

"A book eminently readable, absolutely true, and amazingly indiscreet. . . . Of enthralling interest. . . . It lives, and it is true. . . . On every page is a picture worthy of exhibition. . . . A book to read and not to skim."—The Tribune.

TIDMAN'S SEA SALT

FOR RHEUMATISM.

Mr. John Ellerby, Edgbaston, writes:—"Having suffered from Rheumatism for more than twelve months I was recommended to try Tidman's Sea Salt. I found after two or three applications much less pain, and by frequent use of the Salt at length was completely cured."

Mr. Bienvenu, Chemist, Southampton, writes:—"I recommended Tidman's Sea Salt to a Mr. Balot for Rheumatism and swelling of the feet, on whom it acted like a charm."

Mr. C. V. Garland, Schoolmaster, 66, Oxford-street, Liverpool, writes:—"I have been suffering for some years from bad feet, in consequence of standing and walking so much in my profession, and my legs have been gradually getting weaker. I have been fortunately induced to try your Sea Salt, and I feel it is but just I should inform you of the wonderful effect it has produced on my legs and feet in one week."

TIDMAN'S SEA SALT

THE REAL CHANCES OF CURING LOSS OF HAIR AND GREYNESS.

By

WARNER OLIVER.

An exposé of current fallacies and impossible claims, and an offer of expert individual advice free of cost to readers of "Truth."

"What hope can honestly be held out to the man or woman whose hair is commencing to fall, or is showing signs of greyness, or upon whose head a state of baldness is actually visible?" There is only one reply which can be given by any one competent from experience to express an opinion, and that is, "It depends entirely upon the individual conditions present in the case of each separate person."

From this it will be gathered that I entirely condemn the practice of using universal so called remedies for the hair, whether internal or external. The man or woman who thinks it possible to devise one remedy which will suit all people and all hair troubles alike is labouring under an absurd delusion.

The prevalence of hair troubles in general, and greyness and baldness in particular, is due more than anything else to the public having been unconsciously educated (by those who should know better, seeing that they profess some knowledge of the hair) to believe that when hair trouble develops, all that is necessary is to buy a bottle of this, that, or the other lotion or some internal medicine and all will be well, quite regardless of the origin of the hair complaints and the individual circumstances.

WASTED MONEY.

To a man whose profession it is to deal daily with numerous patients suffering from hair trouble and disorders of the scalp the folly of this and the resulting waste of money is absolutely alarming.

I do not mean to convey that loss of hair or baldness cannot be prevented, nor that greyness cannot be checked or removed, for most cases of hair complaint are comparatively easy of cure, provided the right means are sought. So strongly do I feel upon this subject that I have at my own expense prepared and published an illustrated book on hair and its treatment, of which I am ready to send a copy free of any charge to every one who suffers annoyance of any sort with the hair, and I can state that it is full of interesting and useful facts about the hair and its common ailments and their treatment. It does not contain any puff or advertisement of any so-called remedy; nor does it offer anything at all for sale. To those, therefore, who suffer loss of hair, baldness, greyness, scurf, irritation, or whose hair is out of order in such ways as greasiness, dryness, brittle and split condition, &c., I am pleased to present a free copy, and if it has the effect of stopping the foolish resort to impossible cure-all remedies my object will have been achieved.

Further, it will be seen by the readers of my book that I make an offer therein to consider and send a brief report and opinion on the reader's own case if particulars of his or her complaint are sent to me on the form which accompanies the book. This I do without any charge whatever. Nor is it obligatory that any advice I am able to give should be followed unless the inquirer so desires.

I, therefore, invite every reader who has any trouble with the hair to call or write to me, Mr. WARNER OLIVER, 4, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, W., for a copy, which I shall be pleased to send by return of post. I would ask that my correspondents, when applying, will mention "TRUTH," and say whether they are to be addressed as Mr, Mrs., Miss, Rev., or other title, to ensure its correct delivery.

BENGER'S

The particular and important feature of Benger's Food is that it can be prepared to suit any degree of digestive power. It contains in itself the natural digestive principles which act during the cooling process just before it is finally heated for serving. As the weak stomach of babe or invalid begins to strengthen by the assimilation of the Food, a gradually increasing amount of digestive work can be left to it, thus giving the advantage of a regulated exercise of the digestive functions

"Retained when all other foods are rejected."

OUR PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,457.

THE BEST POSTAL ADDRESS CONSTRUCTED IN REBUS FORM.

Owing to the large number of excellent Rebuses sent in, I have found the adjudication in this Competition exceptionally difficult. But, on the whole, having regard to the conditions laid down, I have decided to award the Prize of Two Guineas to BLENCATHRA.

At the same time, I should like to make specially honourable mention of FIDELS, ASTER, CAW and QU'APPELLE, all of whom run the winner to a short head.

BLENCATHRA'S Rebus, which was printed in TRUTH of January 16th, is as follows:

Stanley Terrace
Bridges

Stanley Head, 2, Middle Terrace, Three Bridges.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,458.

SUGGESTED NEW NAMES FOR THE TWELVE MONTHS IN THE CALENDAR.

Though a large number of competitors entered for this Puzzle, I cannot truthfully say that their solutions were generally of a high quality. The Prize of Two Guineas is awarded to SINCÉRITÉ, with EBORACUM and MINOS as runners up.

SINCÉRITÉ'S list of names, which was printed in TRUTH of January 23rd, is as follows:—Glacifer. Humifer. Ventifer. Undifer. Florifer. Mellifer. Aestifer. Messifer. Frugifer. Aratrifer. Brumifer. Nivifer.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,459.

THE SIX MOST DELIGHTFUL SCAPEGRACES IN ENGLISH FICTION.

A Collation of all lists sent in has produced the following ideal list, viz., Dick Swiveller, Falstaff, Charles Surface, Wilkins Micawber, Alfred Jingle, Tom Jones.

Only one Competitor—TONY—has sent in a list containing all the above Six Scapegraces. But as Tony was awarded a quarter of a Prize on January 16th last, he is only eligible to take three-quarters of the full Prize now, i.e., the sum of £1 11s. 6d., which is hereby awarded him.

The balance, 10s. 6d., being too small to divide among several ties for second place, will be added to the value of the Prize in some future Puzzle, of which Competitors will have due notice.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,465.

I have been informed—please do not imagine I speak from personal experience—that one of the methods employed by the Police to test the sobriety of a prisoner is to require him to pronounce some awkward combination of words, over which, if not quite sober, his tongue is pretty sure to trip.

"Mixed Biscuits" is said to be one of these combinations; "She sells Sea-Shells," another.

Now it strikes me that the Police are tolerably merciful in the matter, and that many more tongue-twisting combinations of words might easily be found. And I think it will afford a Puzzle at once novel and amusing to set Competitors to work to devise such Combinations.

This week, therefore, I am offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas for:

"A COMBINATION OF NOT MORE THAN FOUR ENGLISH WORDS, IN COMMON USE, CALCULATED MOST SEVERELY TO TAX A SPEAKER'S POWERS OF ENUNCIATION."

The words thus combined should have some sort of connection in sense, and must not be of an abstrusely technical or otherwise unusual character; that is to say, they must be readily intelligible to our friend, "The Man in the Street."

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i.) Competitors are—in this instance—permitted to send in three such "Combinations," but not more.

(ii.) The Illustrative examples quoted above may not be used.

(iii.) All "Combinations" must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, March 4, 1907, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of BUCKS, winner of one-eighth of TRUTH Prize No. 1,455, is Mrs. Woodhouse, Merstham Rectory, Surrey.

 The real name, with the address, of KORAH, winner of one-eighth of TRUTH Prize No. 1,455, is Miss E. H. Courtenay, 37, West Square, London, S.E.

FOG.—Your correction duly noted.

MATOPE.—Your change of address duly noted.

LITTLE BEN.—Very pleased indeed to welcome you to our competitions.

SPONGE.—The matter to which you refer has been for some time under my consideration. And, in fairness to competitors generally, I propose to deal with it. But, as you will readily understand, it requires delicate handling.

ELM.—A warm welcome to you.

THE PUZZLE EDITOR.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,462.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

POEMS, IN SERIOUS VEIN, DEALING WITH THE RECENT APPALLING EARTHQUAKE AT KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

The city slept.
Bathed in the sunshine of a radiant day,
Fanned by the zephyrs warm;
And all the land in burning splendour lay,
Nor dreamt of harm.

When lo! a sound.
Nature supplanted by a mightier hand
Helpless was forced to yield:
With rumbling low gloom settled o'er the land;
Death took the field.

The city stirred,
Stirred but to sink before yon awful tread
And tottering wait her doom;
The earth all-heaving rendered up her dead,
And dragged new victims quick into the tomb.

Once more she moved
And, like the wave upon tempestuous sea,
Towering, first rears her crest,
Then curling breaks and breaking falls away,
She sank to rest.

P. F. H.

Houseless and homeless, she and I forlorn,
Gaze on the spot where we had waked this morn,
Glad with the thought that here was our sweet home.
And now it lies unwalled; its roof Heaven's dome.
'Twas not the fever fiend that swept our land.
Nor deadly grip of warfare's bloodstained hand.
'Twas Mother Earth, convulsed in direful throe,
Who spread, nor warned of swift o'erwhelming woe.
Round the dear home is desolation now,
All broken up as by some Titan's plough,
But yesternight I planned a fresh surprise
To bring the look I loved in sweetest eyes.
Or was it years ago?—I scarce can tell.
Ere this destruction on our homestead fell.
Gone all our fruit crop, hope, and work of years,
The home, made sacred by our joys and tears,
All gone! I turn away, to meet brave eyes,
Whose strength and courage make my manhood rise
To meet the worst. Come weal, come woe; no ill
Can crush us quite, while left each other still.

Bel Demonio.

Peaceful and smiling in the sun-lit air
Jamaica lay. No warning sight or sound
Presaged calamity, when, lo! the ground
Shook and split. Then, what a scene was there!
Men, women, children, rushed in frenzied fright
Forth from their tottering dwellings. Well they knew
The import of that message, and they flew,
Seeking for safety in unreasoning flight.
But mortal power could not avail to save.
For, crashing down upon him as he ran,
Man's handiwork crushed out the life of man,
And what had been his home became his grave.

Then fierce-eyed fire, and e'en the rageful sea
Leapt to the cruel work and seized their share
Of spoil. Oh, that a spot so wondrous fair
Should hold so much of human misery!

There, in a smou'dering and groaning heap,
Beings and buildings, art and nature, lay.
And what had wreaked the ruin of that day?
The earth had moved a muscle in its sleep!

Vox.

Gem of the Western Isles, Jamaica! Thou
Seeming to us who visited thy shore
Lately, one summer slumber, weaved about
With mystic spell of deep tranquillity.
Thou, too, then, hast those earth-born agonies
To take the fairness of thy capital
And render back a charred disfigurement;
To turn the busy rhythm of thy life
Into one solemn death-cry of despair!

O, little island, though the shade of death
Has overcast thee, moody, terrible,
And brought thee trouble thou hast never known
Before the horror of that thronging day,
Yet thou shalt cast it from thee, and shine forth
In the old glory of thy summer light,
And find again life-pulsing happiness!

And we who love thee shall, returning, find
Thy calm more soothing from its broken sleep,
Thy wounds assuaged, and wrought to loveliness,
Thy beauty, sorrow-chastened, greater yet!

Little Ben.

Hour after hour, amidst the ruins searching,
With failing hearts we dug, whilst overhead
The hungry vultures, on the débris perching,
Served us as fingerposts to mark the dead.

So, by these birds of evil omen guided,
We filled the lines of carts that waited nigh:
Happy are you, who have not seen, as I did,
That grim procession of the dead go by.

Happy are you, you folks in England, wrapt in
That changeless ease, which Europeans know:
Hear now the story that an old sea captain
Tells of the doom he 'scaped two days ago.

All round and round the angry sea was whirling
Into a deep and funnel-shaped abyss,
They glibly talk in hymns of "billows curling,"
I guess they never saw a sight like this.

And though, at last, both land and sea are quiet,
Jamaicans will not soon forget the day
When Nature's hidden forces rose in riot,
And like an ant hill brushed our town away.

Sponge.

Behold! the earth, and fire, and wind, and sea,
Clapp'd hands and made a bet. They said:—
Kingstown
Shall tremble, topple, fall, and be a crown
For desolation, throne for misery.
Lo! it was done. In fire-bright agony
Man saw his works and children burn and drown,
Then wept he weary tears, and, bowing down
His head a moment, quailed and said: "Ah! me."

But after lifted eyes and forehead high,
Clench'd hands to pay his honour back; yea, fed
Poor empty mouths and bound the wounds that bled,
Laid stone on stone, and plan to mighty plan,
Casting his stakes upon the self-same die.
Reckless is nature? Reckless, too, is man.

J. M. B.

Where soft winds woo, and wavelets sprightly brawl
Around free forest feet of cinnamon
And tropic topiary, lord over all,
The everlasting sun.

There sleeps Port Royal in a crystal grave;
Her splendid sins found pardon and surcease
Of punishment on sweet sea lips that lave
The weird West Indian peace.

The ageless hills above, afforested
With every fruitful tree the warm world knows,
Still shed flower tears for her forgotten dead—
Her unforgotten woes.

Once more hath Nature, fain of man's eclipse,
Astir with awful nightmare, broke her sleep,
Prophetic of the last Apocalypse,
Deep calling unto deep

When God the island of His chaos made,
He blessed her as the fairest of His fair.
But set grim wardenship lest man should trade
Upon God's ware.

Elm.

When Kingston rose that awful morn,
There was no hint of earthquake shock,
Of earth convulsed, and racked, and torn,
Of dizzy plunge, and whelming rock.

The sun rose bright, the air was clear,
The chattering negroes laughed and sang,
While curious white men wandered near,
What things on trivial moments hang!

Hark the dread sound! Crash after crash!
Stout buildings fall, and dust-clouds rise;
And vast rents open, and huge rocks clash,
And every instant someone dies!

Dreadful the scene, some shriek in prayer,
And some in wild delirium pass,
And some, the nobler spirits there,
Would vainly calm the frantic mass.

O God! look down on their distress,
And grant them in their sorrow peace!
In trial and in suffering bless,
And may their sad affliction cease!

Dudhope.

Alas, doomed city! we, who from afar
The echoes of thy dread disaster hear,
And give thee but a far-off sympathy,
Not realising, when we pity most,
The desolation of thy ruined state,
How little aid can offer but our prayers!
How many, lull'd in calm security
Of peaceful homes, will render even that?
So seldom is it giv'n to mortal minds,
Immersed in ceaseless strife for selfish ends,
To penetrate the depths of others' woe.

Who dare deny, of those who would impute
To a just dealing Heaven thy distress,
That thou shalt ever greatest comfort find
In the sure knowledge that, whate'er befall,
God's Heaven is over all? It is ordained
That in our deepest suffering shall lie
Our greatest good, so cometh the belief
That from the ruins of thy buried past
Thou mayest rise to higher things at last.

Elm.

But yesterday we anchored with the tide
In Kingston Harbour as the sun sank low,
And saw the sky transformed and glorified
Purple and gold and crimson in one glow.
We heard the sound of music on the shore,
Where joyous negroes hailed the closing day,
And shining water dripping from many an oar
Where little boats came gliding on the bay.
The light grew dim—the white datura bells
Gleamed like faint ghosts of blossoms on the trees,
And from the gardens strange sweet tropic smells
Were borne to us upon the seaward breeze.
Far off Blue Mountains rose into the air,
And a young moon with Venus on her breast
Hung o'er the highest peak a sickle fair.
As Kingston's Sabbath closed in peace and rest

That was but "yesterday"—now Kingston lies
In smoking ruins on her shaken ground.
The air is full of frenzied prayers and cries,
And death and desolation stalk around.
Yet not all sad Jamaica's tragic tale,
Selfless devotion shines out calm and brave,
And there are hearts that will not tire or fail
While there remains one sufferer to save.

Klondyke.

One viewed the ruin of the ruthless wall
That crushed his wealth, his wedded wife, his all,
And cried, "There is no God; the dead skies fall!"

Another marked destruction on this side
And that, safe in the midst himself, and cried:
"Thus from the lost Thou dost the just divide."

A third laughed loudly and to looting ran,
Saying, "There is no law for lordless man,
Each for himself is God; grasp he who can!"

Then chanced a wandering pastor on that way,
And saw where one hard-breathing, tortured lay;
Then stooped to hear his laboured accents pray:

"Should'st Thou, O weaver of eternity,
Thy mighty woof unthread for such as me?
Be what thou wilt, not what men bid Thee be!"

. . . . . .

They build their walls, they see their city thrive,
Make and unmake their God, for self still strive;
That pastor preaches, "God too is alive."

Gyges.

Picture of peace! No ocean-isle more fair!
Wisely Queen Beauty chose thee for her throne!
Is it the city owns most loveliness?
Thy verdant fruit-groves flecked with red and gold?
The haven at thy feet? Thy fleckless sky?
The background of those everlasting hills?

Vision of war! A moment all is changed!
Rises and falls the earth. Terror, despair,
Havoc and death and fire their orgies hold.
No words can paint the horrors of that hour.

Hear the wild shriek! See yon convulsed hand
Out the 'whelmed ruin vainly clutch for help!
See dark against the glow strange moving forms
Bring wood and oil to feed the funeral flames!
Pyres of the dead! See barges freighted deep
Silently ferried to a sodless grave!

Yet in that gloom one splendid gleam of light!
See how the suffering draw th' unsuffering's care!
See how the blackness of that awful night
Sets British heroism's star afire!

Ox Short.

The sunshine slept upon the land at noon,
A careless land, with laughing folk at ease,
Dowered with all precious gifts of sun and moon,
'Mid her blue tropic seas.

The clink of ice in the glass; the song, the mirth
Of girls. No thunder cloud, no storm wind beat.
Only the old, familiar, patient earth
Clove yawning at our feet.

The rocking land, the raging sea, the roar
Of ruining walls, the awful, anguished cry
Of thousands swept from life, the flames that tore
A rent in the night sky.

Woe passing words; yet death's not worth to bear;
These suffered not man's cruelty—not long
Their passion; theirs no sickness of despair,
No bitterness of wrong.

And mourning them we know his heart who cried
Out of his bitter grief, "Let me not fall
Into the hand of man—I would abide Thy judgment, Lord of all!"

Matope.

When such a dire catastrophe o'ertakes
Our fellow men, we shudder at the tale;
And for the moment ask, "Of what avail
Can be a Heavenly Father who forsakes
His children, or who sleeps and never wakes
When forces none can fight against assail?
When wreck and ruin make the stoutest quail,
While the foundation of the round world shakes.

As towers and pinnacles and lofty halls
Totter and fall with a stupendous crash;
As helpless earth to heedless heaven calls,
Love and omnipotence appear to clash;
Till reason tells us, they who rear their walls
On ground which God marks "Perilous" are rash.

"Cultores Veritatis Fraudis Inimici."—Cicero.

No. 1574. Vol. LXI. Wednesday, February 27, 1907. Price Sixpence.

TO OUR READERS.

We receive hundreds of letters every week from "Readers of 'Truth.'" A large majority of the writers expect replies direct. Of the work, trouble, and expense involved in doing this we say nothing. But as experience has shown that a large number of our "Constant" and "Regular" readers who inquire about individuals with whom we have dealt in our columns over and over again are not actual subscribers to the paper, but merely occasional readers of it at clubs, libraries, or at friends' houses, we consider we must protect ourselves in the matter.

We have therefore decided that henceforth every reader who writes making an inquiry that necessitates a direct reply must enclose a stamped envelope and also a Coupon which will always be found at the foot of the 3rd page of the coloured cover. Without these no notice will be taken of the communication.

Inquiries addressed to "Vigilant," which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through his "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can "Vigilant" send replies by post.

No Coupon will be available that is over a fortnight out of date, except from correspondents residing abroad.

NOTICE.

The terms of Subscription to Truth, which are payable in advance, are as follows:—To any address in the United Kingdom, for 3 months, 7s.; 6 months, 14s.; and for 12 months, 28s. The Thin Paper Edition is forwarded to countries within the Postal Union for 3 months for 7s. 8d.; 6 months, 15s. 4d.; and 12 months, 30s. 8d. Cheques and Post Office Orders should be made Payable to the Manager, Truth, "Truth Buildings," Carteret-street, S.W.

ENTRE NOUS.

I AM sorry to hear that money is not coming in at all as it is required for the proper presentment of the Edalji case at the forthcoming inquiry. It is of very great importance that Mr. Edalji should be furnished with the funds that are necessary for this purpose, and I would again ask all those who sympathise with him, or recognise the necessity for having the case fully threshed out, to assist in providing the money. I shall be pleased to take charge of any contributions, or they may be sent direct to Mr. J. Hall Richardson, the Hon. Treasurer of the Edalji Committee, at the office of the Daily Telegraph, Fleet-street, E.C.

The King is expected to arrive at Biarritz next Tuesday, and his Majesty will occupy the same apartments at the Hôtel du Palais as were reserved for him last year. The King is to stay at Biarritz for nearly four weeks before proceeding on a cruise in the Mediterranean in the Royal yacht.

The announcement, which has gone pretty nearly all round the press, that the King is to proceed from Biarritz, shortly after his arrival at that place, to San Sebastian, where he will be entertained by King Alfonso at the Royal palace, is the very purest of fiction, no such expedition being in contemplation. It is also quite untrue that King Alfonso is to travel to Biarritz to visit the King. According to Court etiquette, the King now owes a State visit to the King of Spain at Madrid, which must be paid before there is another meeting between the two Sovereigns. Spaniards are rigid purists in such matters. The King would have paid his official visit to the Spanish Court at Madrid during the first week in April, but the delicate state of the Queen of Spain's health has caused this visit to be deferred until Easter, 1908.

There will probably be three more Levees later on in the season, all of which are to be held in the Throne Room of St. James's Palace.

The features of the first Court were the very full attendance of the Corps Diplomatique, and the remarkably large entrée. There was a smaller Royal circle than had been expected. There were upwards of two hundred presentations, including those from the Diplomatic Circle, and there were nearly eight hundred guests altogether. There was a splendid display of the Crown plate in the supper rooms. Their Majesties will hold the second Court on Friday night, and it is understood that there is to be another early in May, and a fourth one shortly after the Whitsuntide recess.

The King was last week the guest of Sir Julius and Lady Wernher at Luton Hoo Park. Luton Hoo was formerly a seat of the Marquises of Bute, but after the old house had been burnt down early in the fifties the estate was sold to the late Mr. Gerard Leigh, whose widow lived there in great state after her second marriage with M. de Falbe. The present house is very large, with many fine rooms, and a handsome private chapel. The park is extensive and heavily timbered, and contains a picturesque lake. After the death of Mme. de Falbe, the Luton Hoo domain reverted to the Leigh family, and it was sold to Sir Julius Wernher, who has carried out all kinds of improvements. This was not his Majesty's first visit to Luton Hoo, as (when Prince of Wales) he stayed there several times as the guest of M. and Mme. de Falbe, and the Queen was also there more than once.

I hear that the King will shortly confer the Order of the Garter upon the King of Saxony. It is probable that the Prince of Wales will proceed to Dresden on a special mission to invest his Majesty with the ribbon and insignia, following the precedent of 1904, when the King of Wurtemberg received a blue ribbon, and the Prince went to Stuttgart to invest him. It is, however, possible that the King of Saxony may pay a brief visit to London this spring, either when he goes to Portugal or on his way home. His Majesty, who is now at Dresden, is going to Lisbon on a visit to his cousin, King Carlos. If the King of Saxony comes to England the King will personally invest him with the Garter at Buckingham Palace.

The late King Albert was a Knight of the Garter for twenty years, and when he received the blue ribbon from Queen Victoria in 1882 the Duke (then Earl of Fife) was sent on a special mission to invest him. King Albert presented the Duke with a superb dessert service of Dresden china, which has since been kept at Duff House. There has been an intimate alliance between our own Court and the Court of Dresden since the marriage of Queen Victoria. Prince Albert was a Duke of Saxony, and all his sons inherited that title. When the late Queen granted armorial bearings to her eldest son in 1841 by an Order in Council, special care was taken by the Court that the Saxon Arms were quartered with the Royal Arms of England.

It is understood that the Queen has postponed her contemplated visits to Denmark and Norway until the end of August, and that her Majesty will leave town on Saturday or Monday next for Sandringham, where she intends to reside until Easter Monday, when she will proceed to Marseilles to join the Royal yacht for a cruise in the Mediterranean. The King will reach Marseilles from Biarritz on Tuesday, April 2, in time to receive the Queen on her arrival from England. Their Majesties will return to London from the Continent about April 27.

A daily paper announced the other day that if the King goes to Naples this spring he will motor several miles into the country in order to visit Lord Rosebery at the Villa Posilippo. The writer of this nonsense is evidently unaware of the fact that Posilippo is a suburb of Naples on the shore of the bay. Lord Rosebery's villa stands in grounds which slope to the seashore, and any one paying him a visit from a yacht of course lands at the private pier. The King and Queen spent part of a day at Lord Rosebery's villa last spring, when they were staying off Naples on board the Royal yacht.

The Royal visit to Devonport was not favoured by pleasant weather. There was a bitterly cold wind on Thursday, and the ceremonials at the opening of the Keyham Extension Works were very brief indeed. Several of the papers announced that in the afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales went to Mount Edgcumbe, where they took tea with Lord and Lady Mount Edgcumbe, but, as a matter of fact, the Royal guests did not again leave the Admiralty House after they returned there about four o'clock.

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Glasgow is now definitely fixed to take place during the fourth week in April. The Prince and Princess will arrive on Monday, the 22nd, at Blythswood House, Renfrewshire, where they are to be the guests of Lord and Lady Blythswood until Thursday, the 25th, when they will return to London. On Tuesday, the 23rd, the Prince and Princess will open the new buildings at the University, and afterwards they are to visit the exhibition of the Glasgow Royal Institute of the Fine Arts. On Wednesday, the 24th, the Prince and Princess will lay the foundation-stone of the addition to the Royal Infirmary, after which they are to lunch with the Lord Provost in the banqueting-room of the City Chambers, and later they will inspect the Clyde division of the Royal Naval Reserve.

The Duchess of Albany returned to Claremont on the conclusion of her visit to the Duke and Duchess of Portland at Welbeck Abbey. H.R.H. is not going to the Riviera, but she intends to spend the early part of the spring at Claremont, where she will probably receive a visit from her sister, the Queen Dowager of the Netherlands, who is now at The Hague. It is very likely that the Duchess of Albany will go to Germany at Easter to visit the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha at Coburg.

Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, is to pay a visit to the West Riding of Yorkshire during the Whitsuntide holidays, and H.R.H. has promised to open the new Art Gallery at Brighouse on Wednesday, May 22. Princess Louise will be the guest of Sir George and Lady Armytage at Kirklees Park, which is celebrated as being the traditional scene of Robin Hood's death. The house at Kirklees (which occupies the site of an ancient Cistercian priory) is Jacobean, and the park is large, picturesque, and well wooded.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen had a party of visitors staying at Dublin Castle last week, and a number of entertainments were given, including the second and last Levee and Court of the season, which was held on Tuesday. The Levee was a small one, both as regards quality and quantity. The sword of State, which has been borne lately by Mr. Bryce, Mr. Birrell, and Sir Antony MacDonnell, was last week manipulated by Mr. T. Sinclair. Like other historic swords, it is easy to carry but difficult to wield. Has the doughty champion who can successfully wield it come at last? is the question which absorbs much interest in Ireland at present.

After a short visit to England last week, Lord and Lady Aberdeen returned for the continuance of the season. The Lace Ball, to be held on March 5, is open to all who have been at the Levees and Drawing-rooms. Many special dances, reels, and quadrilles are being made up for the occasion. Irish lace, in its many beautiful varieties, and crochet will have a leading part in the ladies' dresses.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen were present during this week at the opening of the annual exhibition of the Water-Colour Society of Ireland, a large Viceregal party accompanying them. The Society, which holds a good place in the artistic world, is an interesting and instructive example of what self-help can do in Ireland without the co-operation of a Board or a Department, or even of a loan. Amongst those who have contributed to its success and are exhibitors this year are Miss Rose Barton, A.R.W.S., Mildred Butler, A.R.W.S., Mr. Bingham McGuinness, R.H.A., Helen O'Hara, Mary Barton, H. K. Lynch, Mary Perrin, Mr. P. Trench, Lady Ross of Bladensburg, A. Williams, R.H.A., Miss Jessie Douglas, C. Culverwell, and many others. Amongst distinguished English exhibitors this year are Lady Butler—who lent two pictures—and Messrs. Lee Hankey and Francis James.

Mr. John Aynsley, who died the other day, began life in extreme poverty, but he worked hard for many years, and he has died at the age of eighty-three one of the largest china manufacturers in North Staffordshire, and possessed of a considerable fortune. Mr. Aynsley was a most munificent benefactor to the Potteries, and particularly to Longton, of which town he was four times Mayor. He not only gave largely himself, but he was wonderfully successful in begging subscriptions from others, and the Longton Public Park and the Longton Hospital are monuments of his generosity and energy. After the Mossfield Colliery explosion, by which sixty men were killed, he personally collected £11,000 for their relatives. He had a remarkable capacity for business, and the first good chance which was afforded him led to fortune. He worked as a lad in a potting manufactory for twelve hours a day, his wages being 1s. per week!

Mrs. Clive, of Perrystone Court, Herefordshire, who has just died at the age of ninety-two, has survived her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Lyttelton, for only a few weeks. She was the daughter of Sir Thomas Farquhar, and widow of Mr. George Clive, M.P. for Hereford. Mrs. Clive, who retained her faculties until the day of her death, managed her estates with remarkable ability and enterprise, and she was most generous and considerate to her tenants, and munificent in her charities. She had been a prominent figure in Herefordshire society for sixty years. Mrs. Clive was an aunt of Lord Grey and of Lady Minto.

There has been, I understand, some unreasonable alarm among intending visitors to the Canary Isles owing to some cases of typhus fever which occurred at Teneriffe some little time back. I am asked to mention that the Civil Governor of Teneriffe has recently notified the foreign consuls that there has been no case of typhus or other infectious disease in the islands since January 21, to which it may be added that all steamers calling at Teneriffe are now receiving clean bills of health from the consuls.

A noble lord sends me the following offer which he lately received from Mr. J. H. McGregor, of 13, Sciennes-road, Edinburgh, apparently thinking that I may be more interested than he is in proving my descent from Adam and Eve:—

> I beg to offer your lordship a pedigree right back to Alfred the Great; Cerdic, who founded the kingdom of Wessex, A.D. 495, and actually back to Shem, the son of Noah, and therefore to Adam and Eve. It might take a fortnight to prepare it, written on four or five pages of foolscap paper, closely written, and my fee would be 35s.
> If I am authorised to forward it, I ask for no payment until it has been carefully studied by your Lordship, and found to be, not only genuine, but correct.

As a rule, the descendants of Adam and Eve are not particularly anxious to prove the fact, still less to spend as much as 35s. on the proof. But I confess I should like to know how Mr. McGregor traces Cerdic of Wessex back to Shem, for I presume that Cerdic did not bring his pedigree in his pocket when he landed in this country. Mr. McGregor describes himself as "Curator of Ancient Family Documents," and if he has really got the pedigree of Cerdic into his possession, this description of himself seems justified, and a copy of it looks cheap at 35s.

By way of advertisement the Curator also notifies in print at the head of his stationery that "replies to letters have been received by the writer from representatives of nearly every family amongst the aristocracy," but I do not know that this proves much, except the force of the maxim, "Noblesse oblige," in regard to the answering of letters from intrusive strangers. It is more interesting to learn that he has in his possession a steel engraving which is "a lovely picture" of a "young maiden," presumably an ancestress of the peer to whom he writes, and that he is prepared to deliver it free at any address in the United Kingdom for 14s. From this I gather that besides being a Curator of Ancient Family Documents, Mr. McGregor is also a trade competitor of Ernest Day, of the Old Kent-road.

The latest circulars issued from Graylands, Langley, Bucks, intimate that Manning Press, otherwise "Ernest Gaskell, Author," is "very shortly bringing out an exceptionally interesting and beautiful New County Illustrated Work, entitled 'Derbyshire Leaders: Social and Political,' at the usual price of 3 gs. for an édition de luxe." There is no end to this game, of course, for even if Ernest Gaskell, Author, works off two counties a year, there are enough in England and Wales to last him for twenty-six years, and by the end of that time, when a new crop of "County Leaders: Social and Political," has risen, there is no reason why he should not begin again at the beginning and produce a fresh series. But what I cannot understand is that eminent individuals, who really have some claim to be considered county leaders, should allow their names to be associated with such notorious humbug. A few months ago Manning Press was engaged in angling for "Lancashire Leaders" at 3 gs. a head, stating that Lord Stanley was supporting him in his operations. Now that he has transferred his attentions to Derbyshire, he announces that the "Lord Lieutenant of the County, his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, K.G., P.C., LL.D., M.A., D.L., J.P., is supporting this work." I should have thought that his Grace the Duke of Devonshire, etc., etc., etc., knew better than this.

There was a crowded meeting last week of the members of the East Riding Antiquarian Society at Driffield, when the Rev. R. C. Wilton, Rector of Londesborough, read a paper describing the Burlington vault under Londesborough church, which he visited in 1905 during some alterations. The vault had then been closed since 1809. It is underneath the Lady Chapel, and was found to contain thirteen coffins, the earliest (Frances Clifford) dated 1619, and the latest (Dorothy Countess of Burlington) 1758. Londesborough passed from the Cliffords, by marriage, to the Boyles, and later to the Cavendishes. The sixth Duke of Devonshire sold the estate for £470,000 to George Hudson, from whom it was purchased by the first Lord Londesborough. Sydney Smith was Rector of Londesborough (then one of the most valuable livings in the East Riding) for many years. He held this benefice until Mr. William Howard (afterwards eighth Earl of Carlisle) was old enough to take orders.

THE ATTRACTIONS OF ACTRESSES.

(By an Observant He-male.)

A Daily, I observe, inquires
  Why actresses attract us men,
Which stimulating theme inspires
  The ink of many a scribbler's pen.

And some write that, and some write this ('Tis mostly pretty futile rot),
But all alike the point they miss,
  Nor touch the question's central spot.

That point is this: The sirens who Parade the histrionic boards,
Are merely types, condensed in few,
  Of all their sex's countless hordes.

Id est, ALL women ('neath the rose 'Tis spoke) are actresses who play
A made-up part, and strut and pose
  Upon the stage of every day.

Whence follows it, as you can see,
  If we mere men in love must fall,
Or with an actress it must be,
  Or else with woman not at all.

"You seem surprised," writes a correspondent, "at the Times publishing the advertisement of an individual who requires a good house for a month, apparently for the purpose of a bogus auction. What do you say to the enclosed, which I have cut from my Times of yesterday (February 18), and which has been frequently repeated?" The following is the enclosure:—

RAILWAY LOST PROPERTY.

BEAUTIFUL SILK UMBRELLAS, 2s. 4d.; three for 6s.; carriage paid, or call; wonderful bargains.—Western Depôts, 83a, Regent-street, and 150, Strand, London.

The reader will recognise the advertisement as one which has been the subject of frequent warnings in TRUTH, and any one possessing ordinary knowledge of the world can tell its character at a glance. Is one to infer that the columns of the Times are now at the service of any advertising trickster who is prepared to pay the price?

On the top of the foregoing communication comes another from a gentleman who has advertised some dogs for sale in the Field. He has been favoured with the familiar circular from Printing House Square, soliciting the pleasure of repeating the advertisement in the Times at 3s. per insertion. In addition to the old bunkum about all the readers of the Times being substantial, well-to-do people, there is a special formula for this case, asserting that the Times addresses a "large and uniform body of moneyed people among the highest classes of the Sporting World," hence its peculiar value "as a medium for advertisements relating to horses, dogs, carriages, motor-cars," etc. It is news to hear that the Sporting World is greatly addicted to subscribing to book clubs at £3 18s. per annum, and I would recommend advertisers who want to reach sportsmen to stick to the Field, even if it costs them more than 3s.

Dr. Ince, who has been Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford during the last twenty-nine years, has been unable to lecture during the last two terms, and his duties were undertaken by Chancellor Barnard, of Salisbury, and by Canon Cruttwell, Rector of Ewelme. Dr. Ince is now restored to health, and he will resume his lectures this term. He was appointed to his Chair (with Canonry of Christ Church annexed) by Lord Beaconsfield, after the death of Dr. J. B. Mozley, who was described by Dr. Liddon as "the modern Butler," and the same divine expressed the opinion that Dr. Mozley was the best Regius Professor of Divinity since Bishop Lloyd.

Archdeacon Sinclair is to be the Canon-in-Residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during March, replacing the Bishop of Stepney. Dean Gregory, who is also in residence, has rarely attended the Cathedral services during the winter, but he hopes to occupy his stall regularly when the weather improves. It is improbable that the Dean will be able to preach again in the Cathedral. He is the "appointed" preacher at the morning service on Easter Day, but his place will be taken by the Bishop of London.

Canon Jelf is to succeed Dr. Haig Brown as Master of the Charterhouse, and it is understood that he will therefore resign the residentiary stall in Rochester Cathedral, to which he was appointed by Lord Chancellor Selborne in 1880. The revenue of the Chapter of Rochester has been largely reduced by agricultural

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.*—W.F——, M.D., L.R.C.P., L.M., Edin., writes: "I have some thirty patients in all stages of phthisis undergoing Dr. Alabone's treatment, some very bad, so that I should not be surprised if I lost one or two, but at present I have lost none. The improvement in them is most marked and surprising. There is no doubt of the efficacy of his treatment; it has in my hands been very successful in many cases." *"The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," price 2s.6d., by E. W. depression, so the Dean's stipend has fallen from £2,000 a year to £1,200, while each of the four canons is cut down from £1,000 a year to £600. The Bishop of Rochester, who has lived in the city since his appointment to the see, is to remove at midsummer to Kippington House, near Sevenoaks, which place he has rented for a term of years.

At the last Council which was held by the King an order was approved by his Majesty for the establishment of a third residentiary stall in Truro Cathedral. This canonry is to be in the gift of the Bishop of Truro, and is endowed with a stipend of £300 a year out of the Truro Chapter Endowment Fund. The incumbent of the stall is to be in residence during eight months of the year. If the canon has to find his own house, this stall will be "a lean and ill-fed" piece of preferment. There are already two canons-residentiary at Truro, each of whom receives £400 a year.

The Mayor of Nottingham asks my permission to reply to the bard who criticised his views on "Sunday Best" in last week's Truth, and his reply is so much to the point, and such a revelation of the talents that may lurk unsuspected beneath a mayoral robe and chain, that it is a pleasure as well as an honour to oblige him. I hope I may also, without offence, congratulate Nottingham on its mayoral bard. By the way, at Bexhill-on-Sea there is a mayor whom we all know and respect as a talented musician. If the musical mayor would set to music the verses of the metrical mayor, the result could not fail to be a triumph of municipal art. This is what the Mayor of Nottingham has to say for himself:—

Sunday Best.

The Mayor of Nottingham says he Is not at all distressed,
Respecting their theology,
  Who wear their "Sunday Best."

He kr s not, neither does he care,
  How far their view and thought
Depend upon the clothes they wear,
  Or where the same are bought.

'Twas lowly Tom, and Bill, and Jack,
  Who have no silky hat,
Nor yet a coat of Sunday black,
  That he was driving at.

If Church becomes a fashion show,
  It is no place for him,
Whose earnings small and station low
  Run not to fashion's whim.

If silks and sables rule the place,
  Remember Bill has pride,
And if you flaunt your gems and lace,
  You'll find poor Bill outside.

Mr. Haldane's performance on Monday night may almost be considered to establish a Parliamentary record. In the mere matters of wind and staying power I cannot remember a finer exhibition, unless by Mr. Gladstone in his prime. Nor was it less wonderful that, though much of the subject was unfamiliar to his audience, he contrived to keep most of them interested well into the fourth hour, and none seemed to lose the thread of his discourse. But, not being able to sit up all night for the purpose, like some happy journalists, I cannot claim to have digested this heavy meal. Indeed, my digestive apparatus is such that I think I should like a clear week to assimilate properly all that I have taken in.

So far as one can judge at the moment, the novelty of the scheme is chiefly confined to the reorganisation of the Auxiliary Forces. In one respect only is there anything new about the Regulars. Last year Mr. Haldane propounded a plan for obtaining a force for foreign service, by supplementing the Regulars on mobilisation with some 30,000 troops recruited and maintained in peace time on a "Militia basis." They were to provide the artillery train and reinforce the departmental services. Now the Militia is to disappear in name, but there will be a "special contingent" corresponding more or less to the present Militia, and serving not only the above-mentioned purposes, but also to furnish drafts to the army in the field during war. This contingent is to be 78,500 strong, in officers and men, and will comprise a considerable number of infantry, trained in "nucleus" third battalions of the line regiments. The idea is very pretty to look at, but obviously everything depends on the raising of this rather peculiar kind of Militia reserve.

The surprising part of the scheme is the abolition of the existing Militia. So far as they are not perpetuated in the form above-mentioned, the battalions will become Volunteers pure and simple. As it was obvious that Mr. Haldane was going to work on a "two-line" basis, it was practically a question whether the Militia was to swallow the Volunteers or the Volunteers the Militia. Most people expected that the name, at any rate, of the Militia would be preserved, for the sake of its antiquity and associations. Apparently this is not to be, but neither is it quite clear from Mr. Haldane's speech whether the name of the Volunteers is to be preserved either, or whether we are to have a new name for the new force. This sounds like a small detail, but as a matter of fact there is as much quarrelling over names in the Army as over anything, and the disappearance of the historical term, "Militia," is enough in itself to evoke a storm of protest, whether or not the thing itself survives in one shape or another.

What, however, Mr. Haldane seems most entitled to gratitude for is that a definite scheme is at last forthcoming for organising all the old auxiliary troops as a homogeneous army of home defence on intelligible principles and a business-like basis. An excellent part of the idea is the administration of the business side of this army by local associations, partly civilian. I claim to be a part inventor of this notion, and may regard it with undue affection for that reason; but I firmly believe that in practice it will have the best results in stimulating enlistment, developing local pride and interest in the territorial forces, and keeping down expenditure so far as the taxpayer is concerned. But of these and other points one can speak with more confidence when the process of digestion is further advanced.

One matter which the vast majority of the public will hail with unreserved joy is the reduction of two millions in the Estimates. We are requested, indeed, to believe that it is really £2,600,000, as, had no reduction been effected, the year's charges would have grown automatically to the tune of £574,000. But whatever the precise sum may be, it is satisfactory to know that Mr. Haldane has really succeeded in reversing the tendency which military budgets have manifested for so many years. When he held out hopes of doing this last year, I was sceptical, and I am glad to find that I had no occasion to be. At the same time, I cannot help noting that no charge falls on next year's bill for the territorial army scheme. It is quite certain that we are not going to get the improvements promised under this head for nothing, and pounds, shillings, and pence will have to be watched very carefully if we are not to lose in the next Estimates more than we have gained in the present.

A few weeks back I called attention to the extravagant cost of the bungalows erected for married officers in South Africa, and the "intolerable burden" consequently cast upon the tenants in the shape of rent. It is to be hoped that Mr. Haldane will find an opportunity of looking into this question. An officer who writes to thank me for the article remarks that there is only one point in respect to which its accuracy is open to question, and that is the reference to South Africa as "an undesirable locality" in which to be stationed. This disclaimer will be welcome reading to many. The writer says:—

> Many of us like our stations here thoroughly, and complain of nothing but the inadequate pay and allowances we receive for our work. The work in Africa is very real, and very valuable as military instruction—in fact, I should imagine that African training, particularly for mounted arms, is as good as that given anywhere. Were our pay at all commensurate with the conditions of life, those of us who value space, air, and health, would wish for no better country to serve in than South Africa.

The South African garrison is such an expensive establishment that it is some comfort to hear that the country is worth something as a military school, and also that every man out there is not wishing from morning to night that he was somewhere or anywhere else.

I wish I could induce somebody on the Army Council to look at this case. I have a young friend who enlisted during the war in a cavalry regiment, and served first in South Africa and afterwards in India. From my own observation, and by all independent accounts, he is an ideal soldier—fond of the life, sound in wind and limb, irreproachable in conduct, a total abstainer, and all that sort of thing. I believe that he has a perfectly clean sheet for the whole of his seven years, and his only fault is that he would never accept promotion, preferring, like some few others, to enjoy himself without care or responsibility. At the end of seven years he contemplated extending his time, being delighted with India. At this juncture a silly sister wrote from home an exaggerated account of his mother's ill-health, and hinted that if the boy did not come home he would probably not see her again. So the boy, who is a dutiful son, decided to take his discharge, came home, found that his mother had practically nothing the matter with her, and is now burning to resume his soldiering. I have talked to him, and the only question we discussed was the advisability of his re-enlisting as a "fraud," and the chances of his getting back to his old regiment if he "give hisself up."

Now I quite appreciate that the Government cannot bring a soldier home from India for discharge, and then allow him to alter his mind and go back again at the public expense. As a taxpayer I would not suggest that it should. I also appreciate that my young friend, if he wanted to see his mother again before she died, could have had a furlough home on the usual terms. He seems to have thought of that, but he is rather a careful youth with his cash. He grudged the money, though he had it by him, and as he was not sure that the domestic circumstances would permit of his return within the time, he would not pay for a furlough. I think he was foolish. So does he now, but it must be remembered that the cost of a furlough home from India is very stiff. What I want to know is why, when a soldier finds himself in this position, and is really anxious to retrace his steps, there should be no way open to him but the back door of "fraudulent enlistment," with all its ignominious consequences. If he is a soldier worth having, and I do not think there will be two opinions about it in this case, why not let him come back on payment of a small fine or something of that sort? If he wants to go back to India—and my friend seems to think no other country fit to live in, which is not the rule with soldiers—why not take him if he will pay his fare?

I ought to make it clear to the Army Council that in my case the man has not even been discharged. At the moment he is simply at home on furlough. And here he is, sick of civil life before he is out of the Army, and pretty clearly making up his mind that as soon as the Army has done with him he will go round to the nearest recruiting sergeant and re-enlist, come what may. Surely it is very absurd to put a good soldier in this position.

A man with a son in the Dorsetshire regiment writes me a forcible complaint on a pending appointment to the post of sergeant-major on the Militia staff. It seems that a short time ago a vacancy for quartermaster-sergeant on the Militia staff was filled by the promotion of a colour-sergeant from the foreign battalion who happened to be home on furlough, and who had completed twenty-one years' service, and for the latter reason the appointment was much resented by other qualified N.C.O.s in the regiment, who consequently lost the opportunity of earning a full pension. It is now understood that the quartermaster-sergeant is to fill the vacancy for sergeant-major, and the same feeling is again prevalent. There is only one valid excuse for promoting in this way a man of over twenty-one years' service and over forty years of age, when other men are bound to suffer in consequence—namely, that there is no other man available thoroughly fit for the job; and such a case is likely to occur about once in a blue moon.

The story of Lord Charles Beresford's refusal of the command of the Channel Fleet was capped last week by a "report" of the resignation of Sir John Fisher. Apparently the syndicate which is seeking to evict that eminent officer from the Admiralty is so pleased with its own performances that it considers Sir John as good as gone. There has been a trifling miscalculation here, I fancy. Sir John Fisher is hardly the man to retire before a volley of blank cartridge; and if he were, no one would regret his disappearance.

What is most regrettable about the naval campaign now in progress is that it introduces for the first time into the Navy a spirit which has long been the curse of the Army. It is a tradition of the Army for officers to abuse the War Office and lose no opportunity of holding it up to ridicule and contempt. It may be true that this state of things is largely the fault of the War Office itself, but none the less it is a fruitful source of mischief. Everybody with any experience of a big establishment knows perfectly well that no business can be administered efficiently where distrust and contempt for the heads of the firm and all their orders permeate the whole staff and are made no secret of. In an army this state of things weakens discipline, obstructs execution of even the best policy, and creates antagonistic schools and cliques which are far more anxious to score off one another than to co-operate for the common welfare.

Hitherto the Navy has been distinguished by universal loyalty to Headquarters, and discipline and personal efficiency throughout the Service have been at their best in consequence. Things will be very different if organised campaigns against Admiralty policy are to be conducted with any weapons that come handy; if the Admiralty is to be held up to the rank and file, and to the public, as a gang of incompetent cranks who are ruining the fleet; and if officers in high positions are to confederate into rival factions, perpetually intriguing and fighting, and striving to persuade the public that Codlin is the friend, not Short. We only see the beginning of this at present, but it is easy enough to see, and the sooner it is stopped the better.

A naval correspondent relates one or two queer stories about the naval operations undertaken for the edification of the Lords of the Admiralty on their last visit to Malta. Here is one of them. Night manœuvres were arranged, in which one portion of the fleet represented a force blockading the harbour, while the rest was the blockaded fleet. The latter force was to attempt to break through the blockade after dark. My correspondent categorically asserts that before the blockading fleet sailed to take up its position outside, "a confidential memorandum was issued to the rear-admiral commanding it, informing him exactly when the second portion of the fleet would leave, what course it would steer, and at what speed, and the exact position it would be in at a certain time." I gather that the attempt to break through the blockade was ignominiously frustrated, and that "My Lords" were much impressed by the spryness of the blockaders. They knew it was a sham fight, but did not know the extent of the sham. I wonder whether this is true.

At a meeting of the Selby Guardians last week a question as to the desirability of fish being provided for Catholic inmates of the workhouse on Fridays came up for discussion, whereupon a Mr. Ward, inspired by the true spirit of the original Bumble, remarked, "It will not do them any harm to go without meat for a day; it will sharpen their stomachs." I trust the arrogant, over-fed, and bloated paupers in the Selby Workhouse will be duly appreciative of Mr. Ward's kindly interest in their physical welfare.

In some recent litigation between the Chester Board of Guardians and the Waterworks Company, turning on the question whether the workhouse was to be charged for water as an inhabited house or on some other scale, an aged pauper named Boyle was subpœnaed as a witness for the company, and gave evidence as to the use of the workhouse supply of water on the land belonging to the union. Judgment was given in favour of the company. Boyle, who left the workhouse at the time of the trial, has now returned, and last week he applied for re-admission to the classification ward where the conditions of pauper life are rather better than in the rest of the establishment. Though it was not suggested that his evidence was untrue, he was severely taken to task for having appeared as a witness against the Guardians, the chairman telling him that he ought to be ashamed of himself, and his application was refused. For a mean, contemptible exhibition of vindictiveness the treatment of this old fellow will be hard to beat even in the annals of Chester Bumbledom.

A report submitted to the Tredegar District Council by its sanitary inspector last week on the condition of the common lodging-houses in the town revealed a disgusting and disgraceful state of affairs. Men, women, and children were found to be occupying the same rooms, and the houses were over-crowded to such an extent that though accommodation was provided for only 280, 447 persons were found huddled together in them. But the most amazing part of the disclosure was to be found in the fact that this state of affairs was partly due to the connivance of the Bedwellty Board of Guardians. The Bedwellty Guardians contract for the accommodation of the casual paupers who apply to them for relief, and in the lodging-house which held the contract about 100 persons were found, though accommodation has provided for only thirty, upwards of sixty of them being vagrants. It was decided to institute proceedings against the lodging-house keepers for breach of the by-laws. I presume it would be impossible to include the Bedwellty Guardians amongst the defendants as aiders and abettors of the offence, but they clearly deserve to be so included.

A resident at Petersfield sends me a report of what is described as a "turbulent scene" at the last meeting of the District Council. The chairman had given notice of a motion for the dismissal of the clerk. This fact was public property, but when the motion was reached the chairman proposed that it should be discussed in committee, a course against which the clerk protested on the ground that if his dismissal were decided upon in secret it might be supposed that he had done something to deserve it, whereas, if any charges were to be made against him, he preferred that they should be made openly. Some of the members also urged that in fairness to the clerk the matter should be threshed out in public, but by the casting vote of the chairman the motion to go into committee was carried. Ultimately, however, all the members except the chairman and two others left the meeting, and the question of the clerk's dismissal was adjourned to the next meeting. This is said to be a fair sample of the proceedings of the Council, and I should think myself that whether or not a change should be made in the clerkship, changes in the composition of the Council are certainly desirable.

PURITY BEGINS AT HOME.

(A Word to Uncle Sam.)

Our friends across the Herring-Pond,
My comprehension lie beyond;

With Britons constant fault they find,
As folks of horrid, nasty mind,

Who cultivate a taste impure
In drama, art, and literature;

Wherefore they ban, with pious looks,
Quite half our poems, plays, and books.

But when within their Courts of Law,
A case comes on like that of Thaw,

Their papers shameless details print,
At which our press can't even hint,

While day by day some million Yanks
Gloat o'er these journalistic pranks.

Yet they've the nerve with us to quarrel,
Because our tastes are so immoral!

Lord Guthrie, the new Judge of the Court of Session, has been succeeded as Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty by Mr. J. A. Reid, who is widely known as a very able lawyer, and he has for many years enjoyed a large practice at the Scotch Bar. Mr. Reid is an expert on all questions connected with poor-law administration. He has always been a strong Liberal, and held the office of Advocate-Depute under Mr. Gladstone (twice), and under Lord Rosebery. He is much identified with the affairs of the Scottish Episcopal Church.

The Sheriffdom of Renfrew, vacant by the death of Sir John Cheyne, has gone to Mr. J. D. Kennedy, Professor of Scots Law in Aberdeen University. He is a thoroughly sound lawyer, and has written largely on legal subjects. He has had many passages of arms with some of the Judges of the Court of Session, and he usually got the best of these altercations. Mr. Kennedy, who has always been a staunch Liberal, unsuccessfully contested Inverness-shire in 1895.

There was a trio of eminent Chancery lawyers in the later Victorian period who always seemed to me to have a sort of family likeness—the first Lord Cairns, the first Lord Selborne, and Lord Davey. They were certainly alike in legal learning, in seriousness of deportment, and to some extent in disposition, and I always thought there was a sort of resemblance in feature and expression between Lord Davey and Lord Selborne. It may have been a mere accident due to the wig and the Chancery atmosphere, or it may have been the result of unconscious imitation. I have an idea that family likenesses do sometimes grow up at the Bar in this way. Neither in point of intellect nor eloquence was Lord Davey the equal of the two Chancellors I have compared him with, and he was a lawyer pure and simple; but he was a man of great ability, he enjoyed for years a most lucrative practice, and his opinion, both at the Bar and on the Bench, always carried the greatest weight. It has been said that he was unlucky in electioneering, and he was probably the only Solicitor-General who never sat in Parliament while he held that office. I fear the truth is that he somewhat lacked the gifts of a successful candidate. But he was certainly unlucky in missing the Woolsack, of which at one time he seemed to hold the reversion with certainty.

I was glad to see the other day the unsympathetic attitude of Judge Lumley Smith towards Mr. G. J. Howell, of Newgate-street, in an action to recover five guineas for an encyclopædia sold by a canvasser to a customer at Cardiff. The defendant in this case asserted that he had been told by the canvasser that the price was five shillings, and on discovering afterwards that it was five guineas he at once wrote to Howell cancelling the order. As usual in these cases, the book was delivered in spite of the protest, the firm trusting to an action in a London County Court for the recovery of the money. However, the Cardiff man came up to London to defend himself and brought two witnesses with him, and the canvasser's misrepresentation having been proved, the Judge not only gave judgment for the defendant, but ordered Howell to pay his costs and those of the two witnesses. The swindling that is habitually practised in canvassing for books—and, indeed, for orders of all kinds—is, in a great part, due to the power of summoning purchasers to distant county courts, in the expectation that they will pay up rather than travel two or three hundred miles to defend a claim for a few pounds; and it is a pity that all County Court Judges are not as ready as Judge Lumley Smith to discourage this abuse.

There is a remarkable divergence of opinion between the Wisbech Borough J.P.s and the Isle of Ely J.P.s (who also sit at Wisbech) in regard to the provisions of the new Dogs Act for the exemption from the annual tax of dogs kept for tending cattle or sheep. The Isle of Ely Bench, which is composed of landowners and farmers, refuses to grant an exemption to farmers and others who keep only cattle, holding that a dog is not required if there are no sheep. According to the Wisbech Advertiser, the police superintendent objected to sixty-four applications on this ground, and in no fewer than sixty-two cases the objection was sustained. The superintendent made the same objection in a number of cases before the Borough Bench, but there it was decided that if an applicant declared that he wanted a dog to "shepherd" cattle he was entitled to an exemption regardless of the question whether he had any sheep on his land, and in one such case a certificate was granted to a small farmer in respect of a greyhound! I do not know which of these conflicting views of the Act is right, but it is manifest that one of them must be wrong, and the matter deserves the attention of the Inland Revenue authorities or the Board of Agriculture.

The J.P.s of the Buckingham Petty Sessional Division have a quaint idea of their duties in regard to the administration of the Licensing Act. At the recent annual licensing sessions, the chairman, Mr. A. J. Robarts, said they could not help feeling that in certain villages in the district there were too many public-houses. One village with a total population of 439 has no less than seven public-houses; another, with a total population of 481, has five public-houses; and several more parishes are almost equally over-supplied. In these circumstances, it is clearly the business of the magistrates to reduce the number of licences, the owners and tenants of the houses so closed being, of course, entitled to compensation under the provisions of the Act. But while admitting that a reduction ought to be made, the chairman went on to say that "it would be a very invidious thing for the Bench to pick out any houses to be done away with"; that this could be "equally well done by the brewers"; and that it was a great pity that the brewers, who were the best judges, "could not agree among themselves, where there were too many public-houses, as to which should be closed."

In other words, instead of administering this portion of the Act themselves, these feeble-minded magistrates leave the matter to the brewers, and, as the latter—not unnaturally—make no offer to surrender licences, nothing is done to relieve the villages in question of the excess of public-houses, which is an undoubted evil. I commend the chairman's extraordinary remarks to the consideration of the Lord Chancellor. This is one of the districts in which nothing has yet been done to change the almost exclusively Tory complexion of the Bench; but, apart from politics, it is obviously desirable that new magistrates should be appointed who will have sufficient firmness and independence of character to carry out the Licensing Act, even if they have to do what may appear to be "a very invidious thing."

Never having had the pleasure of hearing a zither harp, I cannot say what sort of an effect its music produces. I hope, however, that the playing of the instrument is not as demoralising as the selling of it appears to be. Why it should be so I do not know, but it is a fact that itinerant vendors of zither harps are frequently accused of trickery, and things worse than mere trickery, in palming off the instruments on simple-minded working men and their wives. There was a case at Eastbourne last week in which it appeared that an elderly jobbing gardener, apparently smitten with a desire to become a musician, was persuaded into paying £1 6s. 6d. for a zither harp. A day or two afterwards the agent from whom he purchased it borrowed the instrument on the pretext that he wanted to play it at a concert. It was not returned, and the agent was charged with the theft of the instrument. A prosecution for theft was, in the circumstances, utterly ridiculous, and the magistrates dismissed the charge, but the case conveys another warning to people who have dealings with such gentry as the accused.

A case lately tried in Dublin disclosed a gross scandal in connection with the former administration of the County Court for the East Riding of Cork. It appeared that for a long time prior to his death in 1905 the late Clerk of the Crown and Peace, who received a handsome salary, had given over the discharge of his duties to the Registrar, one Tristram Curry, who put the former's signature on documents with a rubber stamp provided for the purpose. After the Clerk's death it was found that considerable sums of money belonging to suitors had been misappropriated by Curry, and he was allowed to abscond—I say allowed because if the authorities had exercised proper diligence he might have been arrested. It was entirely owing to the deceased Clerk's neglect of his own duties that the defalcations became possible, and the recent action was brought by the Crown against his sureties to recover the amount that was missing, £1,156. The jury gave a verdict for the Crown for this amount, and it is to be hoped that the money will now be restored to the unfortunate suitors. Most of them are poor people, and it seems to me a monstrous thing that they should have been kept waiting so long; for when money lodged in a Court under judicial instructions is stolen by one of the officers of the Court, the Crown should surely make good the loss. It is to be hoped also that effectual measures have been adopted to prevent any repetition of a scandal which was primarily due to the excessive indulgence with which the authorities treated an incapable and absentee officer.

It is astonishing to find how many magistrates still imagine that the man who starves or brutally ill-treats a horse or donkey can be brought to a sense of his duty by the infliction of a paltry fine. A typical example of this misplaced lenity is supplied by the Llandudno magistrates. These worthies are apparently of opinion that the man who ventures to cry newspapers in the streets is quite as heinous an offender as he who practically starves a donkey to death. Notable contrasts in the treatment of offences against property and the person are also supplied by the Coleford and Bedford benches. I am glad to see that the Nottingham magistrates have at last come to the conclusion that assaults on married women must be put down, but at the same time I would point out to these worthy gentlemen that such a result is not likely to be brought about by fining the assailants a few shillings.

Llandudno Police-court. Before Dr. R. A. Prichard and other magistrates. Arthur Davies and George Davies, charged with cruelty to three donkeys. The animals were left in a field without food or protection. One was bleeding from the mouth and nose in consequence of falling against a wall from exhaustion, and had to be slaughtered. Arthur Davies fined 10s. and costs; George Davies dismissed.

Coleford Police-court. Before Messrs. C. T. Palmer, T. T. Taylor, S. J. Elsom, and W. A. Bennett. George Creed and Russell Creed, charged with assaulting Albert Watkins. They attacked Watkins in his own shop, severely kicking and beating him. Fined 5s. and costs each.

Bedford Petty Sessions. Harry Colgrave, charged with wilfully exposing his two children in such a manner as to injure their health. He turned them and his wife into the street at night in their night-dresses, sleet falling at the time. Fined £1 and costs.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Leslie. William Patterson, charged with assaulting J. Walters. Walters was knocked down and his jaw fractured. Fined 25s.

Greenock Sheriff-court. Before the Hon. Sheriff-Substitute. Margaret Bellew, charged with ill-treating and neglecting her three children by failing to provide them with sufficient food, clothing, and bedding. Fined 40s.

Harwich Petty Sessions. Before the Deputy-Mayor and other magistrates. Alfred Double, charged with neglecting his child, aged thirteen. The girl's body was nearly black with dirt, she was insufficiently clad, and her rags were verminous. Fined 20s. and costs.

Tonbridge County Police-court. Frederick Hicks, charged with starving a horse. The animal was emaciated, its back arched, the four legs drawn together, and stomach nearly drawn to the spine. Fined £1 and costs.

Llandudno Police-court. Before the same Bench. William Jones, charged with committing a nuisance by crying the sale of newspapers in the streets. Fined 10s. and costs.

Wellingborough Divisional Petty Sessions. Before Mr. N. P. Sharman and eleven other magistrates. Mary Brown, charged with stealing a pair of boy's boots, value 2s. 9d. One month's imprisonment.

Coleford Police-court. Before the same Bench. Thomas Preest and Frank Macey, charged with releasing three impounded sheep. Preest fined £2 10s. and costs, Macey £1 and costs.

Bedford Petty Sessions. George R. Tanner and J. Ashby, charged with stealing 10s. worth of bones from a field. Tanner two months, Ashby one month's hard labour.

Newton Abbot Petty Sessions. R. Clarke, charged with poaching for salmon with a spear. Fined £1.

Glasgow Sheriff-court. Before Sheriff Fyfe. James Stewart, charged with the theft of a ham from off a lorry. Six months' imprisonment.

Maidenhead Borough Police court. Before Sir George Young and other magistrates. C. Munday, charged with having trespassed on the railway. Fined 30s.

Before Messrs. Lovegrove and Truscott. H. Shepherd and J. Burke, charged with destroying their clothes in the workhouse. Twenty-one days each.

Tenterden Police-court. Before the Mayor and Messrs. E. Howard and J. Chacksfield. Henry Davis, a casual pauper, charged with refusing to perform his allotted task of work at Tenterden Workhouse. Twenty-eight days' hard labour.

Ilkeston Petty Sessions. Before the Mayor and Aldermen F. Sudbury and C. Maltby. A youth named Herbert Spencer, charged with wandering abroad without any visible means of subsistence. One month's hard labour.

Derby Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. W. P. Norman, C. Boam, and J. W. Gandy. Ernest Allen, charged with cruelty to a mare by violently beating it with a whip-stock. The ground was slippery, and the animal failed to draw a heavy load of sand. Fined 10s. and costs.

Nottingham County Police-court. Before Messrs. T. Potter, W. Oldershaw, W. N. Hicking, and G. A. Harrison. Walter Foss, charged with cruelty to a horse. Because it had difficulty in climbing a hill, Foss kicked its legs until blood ran down them. Fined 30s.

Nottingham Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. J. H. Bradwell and W. Hunt. J. Magrath and C. Boness, each charged with wife assault. Mrs. Magrath had two black eyes. The magistrates said they would have to put down the practice of assaulting married women, and fined Magrath 15s. and Boness £1.

Reading Borough Police-court. Before Messrs. Owen Ridley, G. W. Webb, G. R. Jackson, and C. S. Smith. Five boys named Reeves, Martin, Powell, Rivington, and Healey, charged with loitering at the railway station. The first four were fined 20s. or fourteen days, Healey fined 5s. and 5s. costs.

Cannock Police-court. Emmanuel Parkes, charged with being in possession of army uniform and with aiding his brother to desert from the army. Fined £5 and £4 10s. damage, or in default two months' imprisonment for the first offence and a further two months for the second.

Coventry City Police-court. Before Messrs. J. Marriott, R. Hill, and W. J. Wormell. Henry Barber, charged with stealing a pair of stockings, value 1s. Two months.

Rochester Police-court. Florence Boorman, a girl of seventeen, charged with sleeping in an unoccupied house. One month's imprisonment.

Gosport Police-court. Before Admiral Field, and Messrs. E. Lapthorne and R. H. Rogers. Thomas McCarthy, charged with cruelty to a donkey. He gave it running kicks in the stomach, and later it was found in the stable suffering excruciating agony. It ultimately died from its injuries. Fined £2 and costs.

A man named Frederick Robarts got three years' penal servitude the other day, on charges of defrauding various people from whom he obtained capital for working an imaginary business in the London poultry markets. I have since heard that Robarts is the rogue who figured under the name of "Ham" in a swindle of this nature which was described in Truth last July. In that case a half-share in the poultry business was sold for £200. "Ham" drew a great part of this sum to meet fictitious periodical purchases of stock, and to pay the weekly salaries of himself and partner, and when the money was all gone, he went too. If he is really the convict Robarts, he has well earned his sentence. But I believe that a gang of at least three individuals has been engaged in this game for some time past, and the police would do well to look out for the rest of them.

Some instructive light has just been thrown on the notorious Viavi business by the prosecution at Capetown of a Mr. Anderson, otherwise the South African Viavi Company, for defrauding the customs. The headquarters of the Viavi business is San Francisco, whence Anderson obtained his stock. The charge against him was that he had declared the value of the stuff to the customs at a mere fraction of the price at which it was invoiced to him, and a still lower fraction of its sale value in South Africa; and the jury having convicted him, he was sentenced to a fine of £400, with the alternative of one year's hard labour. It appeared in the evidence that what was called a "quarter course" was declared for duty at the value of 4s. 2d.; and that the invoice price, plus certain other charges, was really three dollars twenty-five cents., or a trifle over 12s. The "quarter course" was supplied to the branch agents at £2 5s., and as agents and sub-agents were each allowed 50 per cent. profit, the price to the customer came to £4 10s. The price at which the stuff reached South Africa was therefore multiplied by more than seven before it reached the public. And, looking back a stage further, and allowing for previous profits, and freight to South Africa, I suppose one may take it that the stuff ultimately retailed for £4 10s. would probably be produced at San Francisco for something under half-a-crown.

I would invite country newspapers in whose neighbourhoods Viavi agents are at work to "please copy" the foregoing paragraph, and more especially those in whose columns the business is allowed to be advertised. I may specially mention the neighbourhood of Dundee, where the evening paper publishes an announcement under the heading "Of Interest to Ladies," stating that the teachings of Viavi "have brought Health and Happiness to Thousands of Women," "all Women should acquire a knowledge of Viavi Teachings," and so on. By the side of this gammon may be placed a letter from a resident in the neighbourhood, who says, "I have spent a lot of money over this swindle, and perhaps you can help to save others from the same fate." I can at any rate show them by the light of the South African case how much profit the swindle yields to those engaged in it.

An interesting illustration of the smartness of the American Gold Brick swindlers is afforded by a recent letter from one of the gang. The letters in these cases, telling of "Thomas's" or "Samuel's" discovery of fabulously rich gold mines in Colorado, or elsewhere, always come addressed to persons who are dead, the object being to trap their heirs or executors. Usually there is an interval of a few weeks between the death and the arrival of the letter, for the swindlers in the States have to pick out from the English papers the names of the deceased persons who, judging from the obituary notices, are likely to have left sufficient money to be worthy of this attention. In the present case, however, the letter was posted from New York to a recently deceased eminent public man immediately the news of his death reached America by cable; and doubtless with the idea of giving it a further appearance of genuineness the swindler dated it two days before the death actually occurred. In this instance the fraud was at once detected as one that I had exposed; but victims are continually found among people who, unfortunately for themselves, are not readers of Truth.

In consequence of an inquiry, I sent the other day to Praed-street to interview a firm calling themselves the "Universal Supply Co.," who are offering home employment in the shape of colouring and illustrating show cards, etc., for shopkeepers. My representative found the firm in an almost unfurnished room in a house that had recently been burnt out, and they flatly refused to give him any information in proof of their ability to dispose of the articles when they had been executed by the home employees. In order to obtain work for these people the worker must pay 5s. for bronze for illustrating the cards; and until some evidence is given that the firm have any sale for the work when done, I recommend no one to pay the money to them. A reference to the Truth Cautionary List will show how delusive are offers of home work involving a preliminary payment for materials.

In my reference the other day to the moneylending circular of "Mr. Fred Watts" (alias David Freedman), 95, Jermyn-street, W.," I omitted to notice a point to which several correspondents have since drawn my attention. Copying the dodge of another tout named Abraham Cohen (otherwise "L. Fortescue"), Freedman pins to his circular a slip of paper which he describes as "the enclosed cutting of my advertisement." It is not actually a piece of a newspaper, but an ingenious imitation of one, and the bogus "cutting" seems to have been somewhat carelessly made, so that it includes what appear to be fragments of the advertisements immediately preceding and following Watts's. The portion at the top gives the name of the London and Westminster Bank, Limited, and that at the bottom relates to a "Tour of the Holy Land, Egypt, etc." Apparently this, like his intimation that his office is "opposite St. James's Church," is designed to give simple-minded people the idea that "Mr. Fred Watts" carries on his business in an odour of respectability, not to say sanctity. It seems on the face of it incredible that any one could be imposed upon by such a silly device; but nevertheless I am told that this has happened, especially in regard to the use of the name of the bank. Perhaps it may be as well, therefore, to explain that Freedman has no connection with the bank or the church, though he has a racial association with the Holy Land.

The remarkable begging advertisement of Father Gray, of Fakenham, Norfolk, to which I drew attention on January 9, is still appearing in the Irish newspapers. Father Gray appeals to Catholics to cast a "pitying eye" (meaning a pecuniary donation) on his "struggling infant mission," which he represents as having an average weekly collection of only 3s. 6d., and "no endowment whatever except hope." I pointed out that for many months past this gentleman has been advertising in the press on a scale which probably represents an expenditure of some hundreds of pounds a year, and I inquired whether his appeals had the approval of the Catholic Bishop of Northampton, whose name he uses, and whether he renders any account—and if so, to whom—of the money that he obtains. No answer to either question has yet reached me. In these circumstances I have no hesitation in advising Catholics in Ireland or elsewhere to turn a deaf ear to this reverend mendicant. It seems to me, indeed, to be anything but creditable to the Irish newspapers that publicity should be given to his advertisements. Obviously, if Father Gray's mission in a Norfolk village were deemed worthy of support by English Catholics, it would not be necessary for him to cadge for donations in Ireland.

One of my readers forwards a personal appeal received from Mr. Linnecar, of the Mansion House Mission, Camberwell, which is rather a curiosity in its way, because it shows that in addition to his distribution of circulars, Linnecar occasionally duns people by a more direct method, and also because he furnishes in the letter some edifying particulars of what he has been doing recently in the way of charity. He writes:—

> The other day 170 had a free tea, 55 prize books given to children, and the needy mothers had in all 52 cwt. of coal. This was highly appreciated, for coal is 1s. 7d. per cwt. Others had 18 qt. (sic) bread, last night some pk. of tea (sic) was given, so we go on day by day and feel grateful for any help kind friends give us.

Linnecar's writing is decidedly obscure, but I presume that "18 qt bread" means 18 loaves, and that "pk of tea" means tea in packets. Even supposing that he paid 1s. 7d. per cwt. for his coal—which, of course, he did not—the above catalogue of his benefactions may possibly represent the expenditure of a £5 note. When he issued his last accounts in October, Linnecar had an unexpended balance of above £130 in hand, and since then he has been busy with his Christmas appeals, which no doubt bring in considerable sums. His average expenditure on charity in a whole year, even according to his own account, is between £80 and £90. The reader can easily judge from these facts what humbug in his attempt to work on the feelings of a subscriber at the present date by the above recital of his valuable labours.

Exception has been taken to the appearance in the Truth Cautionary List published on February 6 last of the name of Mr. F. Matthias Alexander, of 1, Army and Navy Mansions, described as "the proprietor of a 'New Method of Respiratory and Vocal Re-education,' whose methods of dunning dissatisfied clients for the balance of fees are both novel and undesirable." The reason why Mr. Alexander's name was included was due to the fact that on September 19 last I commented on some correspondence which had been placed in my possession, from which it appeared that Mr. Alexander had taken the course of writing to the employers of a client threatening to subpœna officials of the firm unless a claim he had made for payment of certain fees was satisfactorily settled. I thought then, and I still think, that such a method of attempting to obtain payment of a disputed debt is quite indefensible.

To my comments Mr. Alexander made no reply at the time, but since the appearance of his name in the Cautionary List he has placed himself in communication with me, and he has assured me, through my representative, that had the comments been brought to his notice he would at once have communicated with me. He further assures me that the case to which I referred was an exceptional one, and that he was labouring under a considerable degree of irritation when he wrote the letters which formed the basis of my remarks. I am prepared to fully credit Mr. Alexander's assertions in these respects, and to remove his name from the List. I may as well point out that it was exclusively because of Mr. Alexander's action as above described that his name was included, and that his methods of Respiratory and Vocal Re-education were in no way made either the subject of remark or of warning.

When referring last week to the correspondence of a gentleman named Taylor of Streatham with a firm at Sheffield, I little thought I was pillorying a bona-fide claimant to a baronetcy. I admit that I ought to have known it, for the gentleman in question and his baronetcy came under notice in Truth in March last; but I find it impossible to carry in my head the names of all the worthies who claim my attention in the course of twelve months. Mr.—or I suppose I should say Sir—C. P. Taylor, of 32, Shrubbery-road, S.W., was mentioned on the last occasion as an example of the spontaneous generation of baronets—a phenomenon of increasing prevalence which has not received the scientific attention it deserves. Possibly he thinks that as a baronet he is entitled to send letters unstamped when he finds it necessary to rebuke people who do not want the books he is trying to sell, and who signify their refusal on postcards. But he is under a misapprehension as to the rights of baronets in relation to the Post Office, and besides, I see from "Debrett" that the Heralds College still fails to recognise that he is a baronet at all.

ELECTION TACTICS.

"Elections," said some Johnny wise,
"Are nothing but campaigns of lies—
They win who most can tell.
Suggest the false, suppress the true!"
That's what our yellow journals do,
And do it very well.

But though Municipal Reform
Is bolstered by these falsehoods warm
From pens to slander used,
I doubt if, in the end, 'twill pay,
For lies, like curses, have a way
Of coming home to roost.

"I see you rejoice at the promised Vaccination Bill," writes a medical friend, "and I have always read with interest your criticism of the administration of the present law by magistrates. But I have never been able to make out whether you are opposed to vaccination." I suppose the reason why my friend is in the dark on this point is that I am shy of giving my opinion on technical matters which are very much in controversy. But if anybody cares to know my opinion, I have no objection to say that, like the majority of people, I believe in vaccination up to a point, provided it be renewed at regular intervals. My belief is that it reduces the chance of catching small-pox, and renders the disease much slighter if caught. But if re-vaccination is necessary for this result, there is as much reason for insisting on the compulsory re-vaccination of adults as the vaccination of babies, and there are sometimes dangers about the vaccination of babies which do not exist in "such as are of riper years." Small-pox being no longer the public danger that it was fifty or a hundred years ago, and many people having no faith in vaccination, but, on the contrary, a violent horror of it, I do not see the justification for enforcing the vaccination of babies against the honest objections of their parents.

I was for many years connected with the town of Northampton. The majority of its inhabitants are anti-vaccinators, and they have always offered such a determined resistance that in the main the children are not vaccinated. Yet there has never been an outbreak of small-pox there. Whenever a person catches it, a system of prompt and effectual isolation is put in force. Moreover, the sanitation of the town is carefully looked after. The result shows that there are other methods besides vaccination to cope with the enemy. As these methods are not adopted in all towns, however, it has always seemed to me that, if an unvaccinated citizen of Northampton were exposed to the contagion elsewhere, he might find himself laid up with small-pox, for it is admittedly most contagious. This, however, is a matter for their consideration.

I was one day talking to the late Mr. Bright about vaccination. He told me that he was once on a visit to the Duke of Argyll, and came across a keeper, or some sort of retainer of the Duke's, who used to breed terriers for sale. He lost many, he said, owing to distemper. Mr. Bright advised him to have them vaccinated, as it was equally effective against that disease as against small-pox. The dog had, when a puppy, to be vaccinated in the ear, and this hardly ever perceptibly affected its health. A few years later he went again on a visit to the Duke, and came across the man. He told him that he had acted on his advice, and had largely increased his gains. I have often told this story to persons who keep dogs. Some have said that they had already heard of this preservative against distemper, but that they did not believe in it, and I imagine that very few took the trouble to try it. But why?

A good many of my lady readers who are not desirous of votes have favoured me with their opinions on the suffrage movement during the past week. As I think it is pretty generally understood that the vast majority of women are entirely opposed to the movement, I do not know that it is necessary to do more than thank my correspondents; but I select the following letter as having reference to one which I published last week. The writer may be quite right in considering that her sex at large are not compromised by the doings of the "suffragettes," but, at the same time, it seems to me a pity that more women do not protest publicly against what is now going on. The best answer to the cry of "Votes for Women" is that women don't want votes, and it is women who can give this answer most effectually. It is really their business to disown the suffragists, and if they did the movement would become a self-evident absurdity, besides being a public nuisance:—

Dear Sir, I have read the letter by a non-suffragette in your current issue. Of course, it is possible that the large majority of women are "grossly outraged" by the conduct of the suffragettes, but why should we—the majority—lose our dignity by noticing such a negative grievance?

No truly educated man or woman could uphold the shrieking sisterhood, and the papers denounce them—not us.

We are not attacked, therefore we require no defence. When the suffragette finds she can only attract the attention of the police she will quickly subside, and I certainly think her defeat would be accomplished sooner if, every time she makes an unwomanly disturbance, she were heavily fined. Argument increases her hysteria, and Holloway feeds her ambition.—Yours truly,

One of the Voiceless Majority.

To my thinking a great mistake was made in not treating the suffrage Amazons as men would have been treated, when they first attempted to storm the House of Commons, and boasted that they would continue to defy the law and its guardians. They should have been sent to prison as ordinary prisoners, if they preferred this to paying a fine. On the second occasion they should not have been allowed the alternative. These silly women court notoriety. They have no particular objection to martyrdom, so long as the martyrdom consists in having a week or so as first-class misdemeanants in a prison, and when they come out, they celebrate their "sufferings" by a dinner or breakfast party, and recommence these troublesome tomfooleries.

If women are to be allowed to riot in or around the House of Commons, because they do not approve of a law, it is clear that men have the same right, if there is to be equality before the law for both sexes. We shall then have men following the women's example whenever any number of them wish for legislative reform. This, however, would be an intolerable state of things, and reduce Parliament to ridicule and contempt.

The sovereign of Dahomey used to have a corps of Amazons. They were true warriors, and fought well. The idea of their enemies not being allowed to repel their attacks in a battle because they were females never entered their minds. But these suffragette humbugs squeak and scream if the police treat them as men, and they protest against it at meetings, and in "interviews." In their recent raid on the House of Commons they were treated with singular kindness by the police, who are the garrison of St. Stephen's; and this is admitted by Lady Frances Balfour, who is herself an ardent advocate of female suffrage. But some of these women seem to imagine that if they strike a policeman on the right cheek he should turn the left to them; if they endeavour to push one aside, he should not push back; and if they insist on rioting, no effort should be made to abate the nuisance if moral suasion fails. Such ridiculous "martyrs" never yet claimed the crown of martyrdom, and it is full time that they should be taught that if they defy the law, vi et armis, they must abide by the chances of war, and when taken to a police court be seriously punished.

Apparently the members of the Cabinet are not of one mind in regard to Home Rule. The Prime Minister, Mr. Birrell, and the majority of the Cabinet are Home Rulers, and regard any grant of local self-government to Ireland as a step towards a measure based upon the principles which underlaid Mr. Gladstone's two Home Rule Bills. Mr. Asquith and Mr. Haldane object to Home Rule, and, therefore, personally they are against anything which will conduce to it. The former, indeed, who has never altered his opinion as to the pernicious character of Home Rule since he repented of having voted in favour of it, announces that if anything is contained in Mr. Birrell's Bill for the Reform of Irish Administration that conflicts with his objections to Home Rule, he will at once resign, and probably this is the state of mind of Mr. Haldane.

The Liberal Party would regret to lose the services of these two gentlemen. But it would rather do this than allow itself to be dictated to by them in regard to their Irish policy. If these gentlemen and those who agree with them on Irish matters decline to accept the will of the party, and of the party's leader, they will have to cease to be members of a Liberal Cabinet. In this matter, they seem to play the part in the Cabinet that the House of Lords plays in the Legislature. They want to have reforms whittled down to suit their personal views. If so, like the House of Lords, they will have to be disestablished.

General Botha is Premier of the Transvaal and Advocate Smuts is Colonial Secretary. Yet England remains unmoved, and even the Stock Exchange is free from panic. What a change of public feeling in seven years—it is almost exactly seven years since the surrender of Cronje. I do not think any one will have the face to-day to say that it is not a change for the better, or that the outlook in South Africa is not brighter at the present moment than it has ever been before. There are a good many questions to be settled yet, and nobody supposes that Britons and Boers in the Pretoria Legislature are going to work together without friction. But they have got to work together, and it is a pretty safe prediction that the longer they do it the less will be the friction. If only the British public will maintain its present attitude, and decline to take the slightest interest in Transvaal affairs so long as the Constitution is observed, nobody need feel the slightest apprehension about the future.

THE PLAUSIBLE WASP.

Queen Wasp full long had envied she
The easy Lot of good Queen Bee,
Who, all the Winter through, did thrive
On Honey, in a nice, warm Hive,
While she could scarce, in frosty Weather,
Keep her Wasp's Frame and Soul together.
  At length the desperate Insect cried,
As wistfully that Hive she eyed:
"Great Hornets! I must get inside!"
  But how? 'Twas here the Trouble lay—
To find an efficacious Way.
Impossible to have Recourse
(She saw at once) to open Force,
Or to attempt that Gate to storm
Where Scores of watchful Sentries swarm.
Her only Chance, to gain her End,
Was to assume the Rôle of Friend,
Approach the Bees with soapy Smile
And try the Arts of Fraud and Guile.
  So to the Hive then see her fare,
And thus, with bland, persuasive Air,
Accost the Sentries stationed there:
"It grieves me much, dear Friends," said she,
"That you the down-trod Slaves should be
Of one whose Greed, as I'm alive,
Doth eat you out of Home and Hive.
Now, if I were installed your Queen,
Oh! what a Change would then be seen.
Your luscious Honey's hard-earned Store
Would shrink by Leaps and Bounds no more;
For I'd subsist, and do it gaily,
On Half of what she guzzles daily."
  To whom a Sentry made reply,
Blinking the while his solemn Eye:
"'Tis true our Queen devours a Lot
Of Honey. I dispute it not.
But then, so well us Bees she treats,
It compensates for all she eats.
And e'en apart from that," said he,
"The Fact remains, she's still A Bee,
Sprung from the self-same Race as We,
And so, by natural Sense inclined
To rule with sympathetic Mind.
While you—howe'er to gain your End,
You play the kind, unselfish Friend,
Are still, by Fate's unchanged Decrees,
A WASP—the natural Foe of Bees!"

Moral.

Oh, London Voter, if you're wise,
Reject the interested Lies
Of those who, while as Friends they pose,
By natural Instinct are your Foes.

SCRUTATOR.

THE L.C.C. QUESTION.

WITH the best intentions I am unable to get my passions up to white heat over the London County Council election; and I suspect that feverish excitement on the subject is chiefly confined to candidates and their henchmen and the staffs of the daily papers. There must be a good deal of make-believe about it in most cases. The management of tramways and parks, street improvements, the administration of "housing" Acts, and such-like matters, are not by nature exciting topics; and you require to be personally connected with the business in order to feel really angry with somebody whose opinion on the subject differs from your own. On the present occasion, it is true, heroic efforts have been made on one side to develop heat and generate electioneering steam by inflammatory language about "scandals" and profligate extravagance in expenditure. We are to believe that L.C.C. administration by reason of its blundering incompetence, and, what is worse, its dangerous Socialistic tendencies, is loading London with ruinous financial burdens, and that the electors will assuredly be fleeced of their last penny unless they vote for Brown, or Jones, or Robinson. Without desiring to boast, I think I have a pretty good nose for a scandal, and it is always a peculiar pleasure to me to get on the scent of a scandal in connection with municipal administration. Unless my nose is much at fault, however, the "scandals" with which the "Municipal Reform" fraternity have been making play lately are merely the smallest of electioneering small beer, and I have no taste for such swipes. There was a mighty outcry the other day, turning, as far as I can make out, upon something of so much public importance as a cellar-flap, in respect to which a company, of which the chairman of the L.C.C. is a director, was alleged to have been too favourably treated by the Council. This "scandal" was brought to light by that enlightened "Moderate" body, the City Council of Westminster, which is such a joy to all Westminster ratepayers. Last week there was published in the Daily Chronicle the official report of a Local Government Board auditor upon certain contracts of the said Westminster City Council. The matter being in a sense sub judice I express no opinion about it, but to any one in search of a municipal scandal it affords far more promising material than anything yet alleged about the administrative errors of the L.C.C. The Westminster City Council, it seems, would do better to cast the beams out of its own eye before looking for motes (even of the size of cellar-flaps) in the eyes of the County Council; and in view of the general record of the local London boroughs, which have always been strongholds of the Moderate party, one would hardly regard that party as highly qualified for the business of purifying or bettering any sphere of municipal work. Electors would do well, therefore, to share my scepticism about "municipal reform" from this quarter.

As for the rate-collector, experience leads me to the conclusion that he will come along with much the same tune whether I vote for Brown, Jones, or Robinson, or for Pickwick, Nokes, or Styles. What is more, so long as Parliament is continually throwing new duties on municipal authorities, and the public is continually demanding improvements of all kinds in the management of big cities, I do not see how rates can cease to rise, or what Brown, or Jones, or anybody else can do to stop the process. Apart from education, which it has only recently been saddled with, the County Council is only responsible for 1s. 5d. in the £ of the charges on the London ratepayer—that is to say, less than one-fifth of the total rates, which for all London now average 7s. 5¼d. During the three years' life of the present Council the L.C.C. rate has risen one farthing, while the rates for all other purposes have risen 3¾d. This seems a somewhat slender basis for all the invective that has been flung lately at the heads of the "wastrels," and until one looks a little further it is difficult to understand why anybody should make such an almighty fuss about such a very little. The general rise of 3¾d. in London rates during the last three years is largely made up of additional charges thrown on the ratepayers by the Education Act of the late Government for the maintenance of Church schools. When this Act was passed, in defiance of the protest of the L.C.C. and many other people, it was calculated that it meant an addition of 4d. to the education rate of London. Such estimates are generally under rather than over the mark, and as the full weight of the burden has certainly not fallen yet, we need not be in any doubt that the full 4d. will come in good time, and we may thank our stars if it does not come to more. With this increased charge in sight, I have no faith in any municipal reformer's ability to reduce the rates by even the farthing addition of the last three years. I look upon him as a humbug, and in such hands I apprehend that my rates are more likely to go up than down.

"But you don't think," some brother ratepayer may cry in his despair, "that rates must go on rising automatically for ever, and that there is no power that can save us?" No, I don't; and that is just the point. All I say is that you must moderate your requirements or you must pay. If you object to pay directly in the shape of rates, you must find the money in some other way. Two other ways are obviously open. One is the rating of ground rents or land values; the other is the undertaking by the municipalities of public services which yield a revenue as well as those which have to be wholly paid for out of the rates, like the schools, and the sewers, and the emptying of dustbins. Unfortunately, the "municipal reformer" is dead against both those remedies, and it is just for that reason that he is such a rotten reed for any ratepayer to lean on. The pair of "municipal reformers" who ask for my vote in order that they may relieve me of my burdens have no objection, I find, to the L.C.C. providing schools, or parks, or sewers, which I shall have to pay for; but they would not have it touch gas, electricity, or tramways, or anything out of which I and other ratepayers may get a few thousands a year profit. This attitude explains what I have never been able to understand about the L.C.C. steamboat service. When that undertaking was first proposed, it was generally admitted that it would cost the ratepayers something for two or three years, and I for one protested against the spending of public money on such an enterprise. But the Moderates, now "Municipal Reformers," were as enthusiastic in its favour as the Progressives; the Council was practically unanimous about it; a Conservative House of Commons approved and authorised it; and even the House of Lords followed suit without a murmur. Mr. Hayes Fisher, who was denouncing "wastrels" in Trafalgar-square last Saturday, welcomed the prospect of a halfpenny rate for such a purpose when the Steamboats Bill was before Parliament. Why were all these disinterested friends of the ratepayer in favour of the scheme? I could not understand then, but I see now. Simply because it was unprofitable, because no private company or syndicate had ever been able to get a dividend out of the business. That is the sort of public service which, according to the doctrine of the "municipal reformers," may properly be left to the L.C.C. It is only when a service is bound to be profitable, like the tramways or the supply of electric power, that these worthy gentlemen insist it must be left in private hands—for the sake of the ratepayers! As a ratepayer, I fail to see the argument, nor does it impress me any more when I am told that if I get a profit out of a tramway or an electricity supply, I am guilty of the crime of municipal trading, and that this is another name for Socialism. Give me the profit, I say, credit it against any charges for drains and dustbins, and you may call me a Socialist or anything you like. This I notice has long been the view of the ratepayers of provincial towns who own their own tramways, gas, water, and electric supplies, and pocket the profits, without objection from anybody.

I quite understand the enthusiasm of great ground landlords, and all the magnates interested in the exploitation of public services for private profit, for the policy of the "municipal reformers." I do not wonder that money is being poured out like water in this campaign from sources in the background by disinterested friends of the ratepayers; that it is even possible, as we saw last Saturday, for the unemployed to be hired in hundreds at 4s. a head to march in a "municipal reform" demonstration with a banner advertising themselves as an example of "what the wastrels' policy has done for London." But that any ratepayer can suppose his interest to be on the same side, or allow his tail to be salted with such flapdoodle, passes my comprehension. It is widely supposed that London is going to return a majority of the "reformers" next Saturday. If so, I wish London joy of the result. I am not assisting in it myself.

CATHOLIC TRUSTS: A LESSON FROM HISTORY.

In the course of the protracted discussion that has been going on in Truth for the best part of a year on the administration of Roman Catholic trust funds, I have once or twice heard of a scandal which arose more than twenty years ago over a fund bequeathed for the benefit of aged and infirm clergy in Scotland. As the matter seemed rather ancient history, and the facts were obscure, I have not gone into it. But I have now accidentally come across an account of the incident which was some months back printed "for private circulation" by the Rev. James Keatinge, Canon of the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Southwark, and the story bears so closely upon the scandals that have been brought to light of late in England, that it is worth telling for the instruction of those Catholics who are indignant at the way Church property has been dealt with by their bishops, but at a loss to know how these irregularities are to be stopped. In 1865 a Captain Thomas Mitchell, of Baldovie, Forfar, died, having bequeathed to the three Vicars-Apostolic of Scotland (the Roman Catholic episcopate in Scotland had not at that date been restored) the residue of his estate, upon trust for the support of aged and infirm clergy of Scotland, and the endowment of an asylum for them out of the revenue. The Bishops, or Vicars-Apostolic, were to be joint trustees of one common fund for the whole of Scotland. They accepted the trust, and received under it some £52,000. They first decided, however, in defiance of the will of the founder, that the proposed asylum would be uncongenial to the clergy, and that the income should be wholly spent in direct cash allowances to the beneficiaries. They next departed from the terms of the trust by dividing it into three separate funds of different amounts for the three dioceses. Growing bolder, they next proceeded, like their successors in certain English dioceses, to divert the trust fund from the aged clergy to general diocesan purposes, and large sums were applied to the building of churches and schools. In some cases interest was demanded and paid on the grants thus made, in others not, in others it was demanded but not paid. In 1878 matters were further complicated by the restoration of the Scottish Episcopate under Leo XIII. and the division of Scotland into six dioceses. Under the terms of the Mitchell bequest the new bishops should have become trustees of the fund. They were not appointed, and for one reason or another they did not claim the position, possibly because they did not like the responsibility, a great part of the trust fund having by this time disappeared.

Matters drifted thus until 1882, when Dr. Carmont, of Blairgowrie, who had been a friend of Captain Mitchell, and is described as "a priest of mature years and unblemished repute," determined to throw himself into the gap, and formally raised the question of the misappropriation of the trust fund. Getting no satisfaction by other means, he eventually, in March, 1883, commenced proceedings against the three bishops in the Court of Session, praying for the removal of the trustees and the appointment of a "judicial factor," which I take to be Scotch for a receiver in Chancery. The proceedings which followed were protracted, but resulted in the complete triumph of Dr. Carmont. The Court declined to remove the trustees, but appointed a judicial factor, who took possession of the fund, and made reports to the Court revealing the most scandalous abuses in connection with the administration of the trust, which could not have been more grossly muddled away by a party of old women totally ignorant of business. An exception to this, however, was found in the case of the Northern Vicariate, where the trust business seems to have been conducted in a more or less unimpeachable manner. Ultimately, in January, 1885, the Court gave a final judgment, establishing a scheme for the future administration of the fund, which was restored to the bishops as trustees, and providing safeguards against the repetition of similar abuses in future. Since that date the trust has apparently been properly and regularly administered, with great advantage to the clergy whom the founder intended to benefit. It is scarcely necessary to add that Dr. Carmont suffered grievously for his bold action in the matter. He was excommunicated and ejected from his benefice—it was alleged on the directions of Rome. The Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda, however, seems to have subsequently repudiated the alleged objections, and in August, 1885, the excommunication was withdrawn by his order, after having been in force for two and a half years.

The bearing of this story upon the maladministration and diversion of trust funds that have taken place of late years in England scarcely needs to be pointed out. Many Roman Catholics, clergy and laity, have from time to time observed in Truth that the most effectual remedy for the grievances complained of lies in an appeal to the jurisdiction of the civil courts. The history of the Mitchell Trust shows clearly how readily accessible and how effectual that remedy is. The case is precisely on all fours with the more noteworthy cases that have come to light in England, more particularly the harum-scarum tricks played with the Dawes Trust, resulting in the loss of £56,000, in the bankruptcy of Mr. Bishop, and the cool appropriation of the mission funds of Portsmouth diocese as a "financial basis" for speculations scarcely less disastrous. The Scottish Court dealt with the ecclesiastical trustees by temporarily sequestrating the trust fund, putting it into order by means of a judicial officer, and restoring it to the trustees under a scheme of its own approval, for the due observance of which definite safeguards were provided. There cannot be any reasonable doubt that the High Court in England, if invoked, would exercise its jurisdiction on much the same lines. An attempt has already been made, as shown in these columns a few weeks ago, to set in motion the Charity Commission for a similar purpose; but it was frustrated by the timid reluctance of that body to enter into conflict with the Roman Catholic hierarchy in England. No such scruples will hamper the action of a judge of the High Court; the issue of a writ in the Chancery Division will set the machinery in motion, and, once in motion, nothing will stop it until the Court is satisfied that the trust is being and will be administered in accordance with the donor's directions.

One difficulty, and one only, stands in the way of this course of action. A man must be found bold enough and unselfish enough to bring his ecclesiastical superiors before the Court and fight the matter out, regardless of the consequences to himself, as Dr. Carmont fought the Mitchell case. Dr. Carmont's experience shows that every weapon in the ecclesiastical armoury will be used against him; but it also shows that if he succeeds in his civil action the persecution which he will suffer is not likely to be more than temporary. Precisely what passed between the Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda and the Scottish Bishops in reference to Dr. Carmont's excommunication I do not quite understand. But it is evident that whatever Rome did, if it did anything, was done in such a way as to leave the door open for a subsequent retreat; and I think it may be taken that the very astute ecclesiastics who manage these matters at the Vatican are not likely to put themselves in the position of supporting through thick and thin the action of Bishops who, by making ducks and drakes of Church property, have been worsted in a civil court and proved wrong in the sight of all men. In the earlier part of the controversy over the Church funds, it was hoped and expected by many influential Catholics that Rome would spontaneously deal with the scandal that had arisen, and this seemed to me the simplest and most decent solution of the question. But the time for such hope is past, and the part taken by Cardinal Merry del Val in connection with the recent application to the Charity Commissioners suggests that there was never much hope of papal action. The position is, therefore, clearly defined. If among the many English members of the Roman Church who have written to Truth on this subject, and the many more who sympathise with them, any are to be found who will, in colloquial language, "face the music," and bring the grievances of clergy and laity to the test of a civil action, the evil that has been done may be to a great extent repaired, and a lesson taught which will protect ecclesiastical property from episcopal folly and greed for many years to come. If not, I do not see that there is anything else worth saying on the subject. If the rank and file of the Roman Catholic Church in England, lay and clerical, are not prepared to help themselves, it is now clear that no one else will help them. It has been said that in all countries men have the government which they deserve, and this is true in the affairs of the Church no less than in those of the State.

A GAMBLING SCANDAL AT CALCUTTA.

I have received from Calcutta an account of some remarkable proceedings in connection with a "Fancy Fête," which was recently held on the Maidan in aid of the Minto Nursing Fund and the Calcutta Hospitals. The fête was organised by an executive committee, over which Lady Minto, the wife of the Viceroy, presided. The object in view was an excellent one, and financially the affair appears to have been an immense success. For nearly a fortnight it provided Calcutta people with an entertainment in the form of a miniature Earl's Court Exhibition and a Military Tournament combined, which was much appreciated. Unfortunately, however, certain features were introduced which have aroused much adverse criticism, more especially in view of the fact that the fête was being held under the auspices of the Viceroy and Lady Minto. My correspondent writes:—

"First should be mentioned Lady Minto's 'Lucky Bag,' an attraction of the fête which was advertised months beforehand. The 'Lucky Bag,' the public were informed, would contain many valuable prizes, and it was announced a few days before the show was opened that the chances would be four to one. As a result of these inducements and the mention of some of the prizes, such as a gig, a cottage piano, and some diamond ornaments given by Lady Minto, as many as thirty thousand tickets were sold at a rupee each before the day on which the 'Lucky Bag' was to close. When the time came for the draw to begin an immense crowd had gathered round the 'Lucky Bag' tent; soldiers, sailors, and police had to be requisitioned to keep the crowd in order, and a pandemonium ensued. The discomforts that were endured in the crush might have been forgiven and forgotten, but the public indignation was finally roused by the manner in which the draw was conducted, and the trumpery nature of the majority of the prizes. Every petty tradesman in Calcutta seems to have seized the opportunity of obtaining a cheap advertisement by contributing some rubbishy article from his stock-in-trade to the 'Lucky Bag.' Thus when people went up with twenty tickets, drew nineteen blanks and one prize, and were then solemnly presented with a roll of coloured crinkled paper, a tin of somebody's patent food, or a packet of somebody's cheap cigarettes, they began to feel that they had been hoaxed. This feeling was intensified by the fact that—contrary to the rules that had been published—they were not allowed to draw for themselves, even if they managed to reach one of the barrels. In many cases ticket-holders who were afraid to face the struggle persuaded soldiers or sailors, who were on duty to keep the crowd in order, to take their tickets up to the barrel. In such cases officials in charge were heard to ask, 'Is it for a lady or gentleman?' before handing out the discs. As the ladies generally got at least one prize the public naturally drew inferences, and the local papers have published numbers of letters from ticket-holders in which the bona-fides of the 'Lucky Bag' have been impugned. I have omitted to mention that on the strength of the receipt of a few more prizes, including a baby elephant (won by Lord Kitchener), the committee, at the last moment, re-opened the sale of tickets and disposed of another 20,000 tickets, thereby reducing the chances of ticket-holders enormously.

"So much for the 'Lucky Bag.' I now come to what was really a disgraceful feature of the fête. In various parts of the grounds were tents in which Roulette, Les Petits Chevaux, and various other kinds of gambling devices well known to certain foreign resorts, were kept in full swing. It is needless to say that they proved highly attractive, and the edifying spectacle was provided of poor Eurasians and Indians gambling with their hard-earned rupees for the benefit of the show, which most of these poorer Indians believe, by the way, was really organised in honour of the Amir's visit. Now the law of India is very stringent in regard to gambling, and for the last few years the Governments and police of the various provinces have been engaged in a vigorous campaign to stamp out the various forms of it which exist. But it was not until after the open, organised gambling at this fête had gone on for more than a week, under the very eyes of the Viceroy and members of his Government, who were constant visitors, that it was announced that the tents were to be closed, and added 'semi-officially' that this was at the personal request of the Viceroy himself. On the same day that the public were gambling merrily at the fête, two unfortunate men were hauled up at the Calcutta Police Court and sent to gaol for 'gambling for money with cards.'"

The management of the "Lucky Bag" was undertaken by a special committee, and it would be grossly unfair to blame the Viceroy or Lady Minto on account of the manner in which the drawing was conducted by the persons in charge of it. But the "Lucky Bag" was manifestly nothing else than a huge lottery, and it is certainly astonishing that it should have been allowed to take place at all under Viceregal patronage. Only a few years ago a stop was put to the promotion of so-called "Lucky Bags" in Calcutta at Christmas time, and in various directions the law against gambling has latterly been enforced more strictly than used to be the case. The duty of the police and the magistrates must, however, obviously become exceedingly difficult when not only the drawing for a lottery, but playing at roulette tables and other forms of gambling, are openly included among the attractions at a great public entertainment. It is satisfactory to learn that the Viceroy eventually requested that the gambling tents should be closed; it is much to be regretted that the committee of the fête ever permitted them to be opened.

THE CHARING CROSS USURY SHOP.

A great many inquiries are being directed to me as well as to my City Editor in reference to "The Charing Cross Bank," 28, Bedford-street, W.C., and 39, Bishopsgate-street Within, E.C., which has lately embarked on a vigorous advertising campaign, carried on partly through the newspapers, and partly through the distribution of prospectuses. It may be useful, therefore, if I explain once more that this concern is not a bank at all in the ordinary acceptation of the word, but a common usury-shop registered under the Moneylenders Act by one Alfred Wm. Carpenter. The fact that Carpenter is permitted to pose as a "bank" is, indeed, a signal proof of the unwisdom of Parliament in rejecting the original proposal of the Select Committee on Moneylending that the Act of 1900 should absolutely prohibit the use of all such misleading titles. In this case the title is misleading not only to borrowers but to lenders too, for Carpenter is himself a very extensive borrower. The most prominent feature in his present advertisements is a statement that his so-called bank receives deposits of £10 and upwards at rates of interest ranging from 5 per cent. per annum on sums subject to three months' notice of withdrawal, up to 10 per cent. on sums subject to five years' notice of withdrawal. It is also stated that the bank's "terminable deposit bonds pay nearly 9 per cent., and are a safe investment."

It is obvious that these tempting terms, when offered by an institution with the high-sounding title of "The Charing Cross Bank," are likely to attract deposits from people who, though more or less unsophisticated, would not think of advancing money to plain Alfred Wm. Carpenter, usurer. I have, in fact, heard of several cases in which a deposit—amounting in one instance to a very substantial sum—has been made under the quite erroneous impression that the money was being put into a legitimate banking business. More cautious than these depositors, one of my correspondents called at the bank and asked for the names of the directors, and a copy of the last balance-sheet. He was told that there were no directors, and that no balance-sheet was published, but that he would find information as to the bank's financial position in the newspapers. The only discoverable information of the kind in the newspapers is the following in the advertisements of the bank:—

Assets, £1,136,249. Liabilities, £796,788.
Surplus, £339,461.

From the point of view of an investor, these figures, put forward without any sort of verification, are, of course, absolutely worthless. "Owing to the nature of our investments," the advertisement proceeds, "we are able to pay rates of interest on deposits that will compare favourably with dividends paid on almost any class of stock or shareholding securing the safety of capital." No doubt a usurer of Carpenter's type can make big profits, but the business has very considerable risks, and these are probably increased rather than diminished when the usurer is employing capital provided by other people. One illustration of the risks of the business was given a few weeks ago, when Mr. Justice Channell cut down by one-half the interest which this bank had charged in a harsh and unconscionable bill of sale transaction.

Putting aside, however, any question as to the safety of the investment, persons who contemplate depositing money with the Charing Cross Bank should bear in mind that they will thereby become partners in a disreputable bloodsucking business. It seems to me that those who knowingly place themselves in this position would not be entitled to the slightest sympathy if, owing to the more stringent administration of the Moneylenders Act or any other cause, they lost their money. As to those who have become depositors in the bank in ignorance of its real character, on grounds both of prudence and self-respect they should withdraw as speedily as possible.

THE THEATRES.

Madame Jane Hading at the "New Royalty."

To judge from the numbers of people that have crowded the newly-decorated little playhouse in Dean-street, the French play has decidedly become the fashion. There is one peculiarity of playgoers in the matter of theatres generally which seems exasperated in the case of the French theatre: so many of them come late.

When the curtain rose upon Alfred Capus's charming comedy one evening last week, the stalls were not more than one-third full. By the end of the long first act my toes had been trampled upon by many feet that might well have been armed with hobnails, to judge by the sensation, and countless buxom ladies had brushed past. Neither experience was agreeable in the very spring of the play. "La Châtelaine" was not early in beginning, and I am sure it must have been half-past nine when the last straggler had stumbled to his or her place, and the theatre was quite full. Perhaps one resents this stampede more when the play is interesting and the players so much above the average, as are Mme. Jane Hading and M. Arnaud, to name the principals in a strong and at all points competent cast.

Earlier in the week Mme. Hading, who is well known in London owing to her frequent visits to the Coronet Theatre and elsewhere, gave the public another taste of her fine quality in "L'Aventurière." The end of the week was reserved for "La Châtelaine."

M. Capus is a writer of infinite ingenuity and resource. I have never known him dull, and although I have known him considerably more audacious than in "La Châtelaine," yet I believe he made every one enjoy themselves who remained to the end, which some, I regretted to see, did not. The last act is of first-rate importance to an appreciation of the work as a whole. In it one sees the crushing superiority of André Jossan (M. Arnaud) thoroughly manifested to the mean and desperate husband of the woman he loves. My readers have only to be apprised of the main outline of the play to see this. André Jossan has made a fortune in business, having begun life by losing one at cards. He meets Thérèse de Rives, whose husband has deserted her, having previously impoverished both through prodigalities for a mistress. Thérèse has a castle to sell. It is her last asset. At first, greatly over-valuing it and ignoring the heavy mortgages raised for her husband upon it, the news of the amount likely to be received by her on the sale comes as a crushing blow. Her distress is not wholly selfish, as she has a little son. At this juncture supervenes André Jossan. He falls in love at first sight, takes in the situation at a glance, and buys the castle from her by a form of direct treaty (between principals) known to French law. His family, and those who scheme a marriage for him with a young girl, are furious. The rest of the play shows how this man, who has been through the mill, reads at once the purposes of his adversaries, stimulates the woman he loves not to run after her little son, who has been abducted by her husband, since he will certainly try to make profit out of the situation, and therefore bring him back again, at a price. In the last act, the interview between the two men was, to my mind, the most interesting moment of the evening. Gaston de Rives admits himself all along to be the inferior of André Jossan; he admits to his wife in the previous act that he does not love her, and only insists upon her returning to him in order to make the successful André feel the taste of bitter, for once in his life. In this last act, however, Gaston de Rives' feelings are so wrought upon by the sight and presence of the man whose success he hates more than his person, that he begins the interview with a challenge. This André refuses, having decided no longer to risk his life, save for what is well worth while. And Gaston de Rives is not worth while. No, he will talk it over, and convince this foolish husband that he had much better go back to the mistress he loves and free the wife whom he hates, by divorce. Gaston de Rives refuses all his offers, says he will carry off the boy, and will certainly be followed by the boy's mother. Exasperated, André cries out: "Well, then, I will fight you, and rid the earth of a ruthless encumbrance!" "But I will not fight now," retorts Gaston. A fine situation, with the two men exasperated to the highest pitch, for, provoked beyond endurance by Gaston's cynical insistence on his legal rights, André loses his self-control, and Gaston comes up to him, for a moment, on the moral plane. André's explosion of anger has calmed De Rives, who experiences for the first time in his life the luxury of pseudo-magnanimity, calls his wife, and, having obtained her pardon for all his misdeeds, hands her over to André Jossan, astonished beyond measure at this sudden achievement of his hopes.

I think M. Capus is right in his psychology of Gaston. The man had latent in him qualities which it took the strength and character of André to bring out. Jealousy of André's perpetual triumphs alone stood in the way of his admitting the equity of André's claims. The moment he saw André weak, he could afford to be generous.

Mr. Cyril Maude's idea of producing plays for a few matinées is not a new one, but it is none the less a good idea for that. The more trial trips there are, the more likely we are eventually to hit upon good plays. Undoubtedly some good plays have been crushed out of existence owing to the successful runs of mediocre plays, and certainly some good plays have never and never will see the light owing to the inability of the dramatist to get a hearing. The play that Mr. Maude will produce for a series of matinées—the first on Tuesday, March 12—is entitled "Her Son," by Mr. Vachell, and (I rather regret to see) is adapted from a novel by the author. I should have prefered an originally dramatic work, but this play was well spoken of when first produced at Glasgow. Mr. Maude is naturally anxious to make it known that the matinées of "Toddles" will not be interfered with by this venture.

The Zancigs have departed, and there is a new ballet to be seen at the Alhambra. "The Queen of Spades" is described as quite different from "L'Amour," but does not seem altogether novel in theme, describing as it does the struggle between self-denial and the temptations of modern life. But though this theme is as old as the

At Hengler's Circus a troupe of champion wrestlers now challenge all-comers for substantial prizes, while the remainder of the programme remains unchanged. I observe, also, that the old fashion of half-price after 9.15 o'clock has now been introduced at this place of amusement.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

"GRIPPE" PATIENTS.

WE have plenty of subjects to talk about this week, but suffer too severely from grippe to converse on any. Nearly every one I know is "down" or barely convalescent, and too weak to gad about, though it were only in well-heated drawing-rooms. Grippe kills, it seems to me, faster than typhoid, poisons the blood for a long time to come, and makes one more liable to be again attacked in other gripal visitations. The necrological city returns show a sudden rise of fifty deaths a day in the bills of mortality. They are all due to grippe or influenza—a word meaning bad influence, and introduced here when France had an Italian Queen who believed in astrology. The sequelæ will be worse than the evil visitor itself. If any one who reads these lines has a weak heart or delicate lungs, or a too wakeful nervous system, let him or her beware.

Keeping in bed, as M. Clemenceau thought well to do for nearly ten days, is the best course. He is sound as bell metal, but the wear and tear of his life have been great, and his nerves may be said to burn his blood, they being the nerves of a man of genius, and of every great artist, whether pictorial, literary, or oratorical. He could not join in the debate on the last law of M. Briand a week ago in the Chamber. Instead, he sat by while that Minister danced his pas seul, and dropped words of encouragement in a short sentence whenever the speaker in the tribune went according to the sentiment of the majority. He was able since to go to hear Mme. Caron in "Orphée" at the Opera. He is one of her many admirers, and has been so from the outset of her career. M. Clemenceau's grippe obliged him to countermand a grand dinner for eighty at the Ministry of the Interior. The guest list included the principal diplomats now in Paris, the old and faithful friend M. Pichon, who is impeccable as Minister for Foreign Affairs, the expected Swedish lion of the hour who has effected the North-West passage round the Pole, and a number of other celebrities. I dare say the Prime Minister, in giving orders to cancel invitations, felt a sense of intense relief. He hates those great "feeds" known as "banquets" and "State dinners." Their sameness is the least of their drawbacks. The single compensation they offer is the post-prandial conversation in the smoking-room. Diplomats do not bore there. Celebrities are often hommes d'esprit, though some of them in a big gathering are sure to be poseurs, which makes their company tiresome. M. Clemenceau is, and has been all his life, sober in eating, and is from taste a tea and water drinker only. He could have made a handsome income as a tea taster in the time when there was no Ceylon or Indian tea in the market. Fine teas are one of his hobbies. He takes his tea, which costs 12 fr. a pound, without cream, sugar, or the Russian slice of lemon, and sips it as though it were precious nectar. He rarely quaffs it, and the contents of a small Bokhara tea-pot are enough for him at a time. This sobriety stands him in good stead. I think him, in spite of the consuming nerves, the youngest man of his age either in the Senate, the Chamber of Deputies, or the artistic world.

More than half the invités of M. Clemenceau were in bed from grippe when they received the counter invitations. This grippe nearly caused a break-up of the Ministry. But all's well that ends well. M. Briand has backed engines according to the wishes of the Chamber. That body is ready to indulge in any way the ordinary clergy, which is at heart national, but fears to be one day left in the lurch if it went in for Gallican liberty. It felt inclined to turn out the Minister of Cults for the march he took in his chief's absence in the direction of concessions to Rome. The Vatican wants to bring members of the religious orders, in the cassocks of curés, into the churches. This the Chamber will not have. It professes to have had too much, under the Concordat, of preaching monks, to again allow them to mount the pulpits. If the mayor of a commune leases a church for three, six, nine, or eighteen years, to a particular curé, the lease cannot be passed on to any one else without the renewed consent of communal council and mayor. The last Briand Law had ambiguities which the Chamber blamed. Its author has given in on the question of the interpretation. I may add that Freemasonic members of municipal councils say this is not enough. A Ministerial circular is not binding on any one. The faulty article or clause in the law itself will have to be revised; and I dare say that satisfaction will be given on this point to the Freemasons.

Influenza has notably affected the theatrical season. Not only the leading singers and players have been sufferers, but the understudies as well. It has interfered with Post Office arrangements. The illness is said to have been most severe towards letter-carriers, telegraphic clerks, and the young ladies of the telephonic department. The delivery of letters is delayed in many parts of the town, and newspapers are piled up in the Post Office local bureaux as during the strike of the letter-carriers.

I have doubly paid my tribute to the influenza scourge, inasmuch as a relapse followed recovery from the first attack. I try never to write a letter when I suffer from the malady, owing to a wish not to spread it. When I must write, I disinfect as much as I can. The course of treatment is, if the cough and fever cause insomnia, a few drops at night of paregoric elixir, supported by a cup or two of some infusion—quatre-fleurs, or lime-flowers. The latter is an active sudorific. The four flowers—violets, camomile, the corn-poppy, and something else, I know not what—are less sudorific, but calming. In the way of food, only milk in half-and-half proportion with hot water, and on the third or fourth day hot milk at meal times with a beaten-up egg and sugar in it. I find that an open window and a blazing fire keep the air of the room stimulating and pleasant. Later on boiled vegetables and fruit may be added to the milk and two eggs. Give up meat until well out of the wood. Should weakness follow, one's bed under an eider-down quilt is the best place.

The family and the physician of the late Princess Clementine made a grave mistake in allowing her to rise from a bad attack of grippe to make a long journey. There is no more terrible climate for weak or weakened lungs than that of Vienna. The Coburg palace there is a cold, sullen-looking barrack, and has been practically uninhabited since the Princess Louise of Belgium left it. The Princess Clementine was to break her journey there en route for Mentone. She went from Sofia to Mentone last year and the year before without halting—a record feat for an old lady on the verge of ninety. For many years she had led the life of a King's Messenger, going from capital to capital and Court to Court to consolidate her son's position in Bulgaria. Her vitality up to the recent attack of influenza had seemed unimpaired and her equanimity unshaken by this trying kind of existence. One might have thought that she never knew what it was to be put out. Yet she had quick feelings and risked many a hard rub. It may be that her stone deafness, in shutting her out from tiresome chatterers, defended her nerves. It threw her back on her own thoughts. This was an advantage, as they were high, sweet, and luminous. She also knew what the pleasures of memory are. She never wished to be a man. Her words were, "Mon rôle de femme me suffit grandement. C'est un joli rôle, quand il est bien compris. Tout est là."

The Princess had endless contrarieties in her family circle. She had, since the opening of the Russo-Japanese war, a comparatively easy mind. The leisure this afforded her admitted of her devoting herself to the education of her two Bulgarian granddaughters. They slept in her room. She watched over them closely without letting them know they were under observation. Both learned to speak so distinctly that she could tell what they said from the motions of their lips. She spoke last year of different crosses she had to bear. One was "never to hear the sweet, childish voices of Eudoxia and Nadejda." The ear-trumpet never conveyed the true tone.

The Princess Clementine had for her professor of French history that transcendant genius Michelet. Thereby hangs a tale, not to the discredit of master or pupil. Obituary services in memory of the venerable Princess were celebrated at Sofia in the Chapel Royal (Prince Ferdinand ranks as Royal Highness) in Vienna, in Paris in the Chapel of St. Ferdinand de Neuilly, at the Madeleine, at Chantilly, and at Coburg, where her remains now lie in the mausoleum built by her husband.

The Duc d'Orléans returned to London directly after the reading of her will at the Coburg Palace. The Duchess went on with her uncles and aunts to Coburg.

A Dominican preacher, Father Monsabré, has fallen a victim to the "malign influence." He had a great vogue after Father Hyacinthe married, and Père Felix had to keep silent as a punishment for his vanity. He reminded persons who had seen O'Connell of that orator, but had not his might. Characteristics of both were vehemence, a talent for calling names, exuberant fancy, humour, and a life and movement that carried away their hearers. The magnetic personality of O'Connell, and in a less degree perhaps of Monsabré, helped their eloquence. The monk had a short burly figure and a homeliness that ran into vulgarity. His ferocious and acute argumentation was greatly talked of when he delivered Advent and Lent lectures in different metropolitan churches. Some years ago he incurred disgrace at Rome; why, nobody could think, and he retired for the rest of his life to a monastic house near Havre. The Combes law obliged him to "secularise" his habit.

As Paris sets the fashions to London, I expect soon to see ladies of quality setting up as cabbies. I know one lady of quality who might safely take at a brisk pace a mail coach to Epsom on the Derby day. Lady Di Huddleston, as a "whip," used to be one of the attractive sights of Hyde Park. She made driving a pony team a conquest of Baron Huddleston. We have now in Paris six women cabbies. They are rather good-looking, give a smart air to their regulation garments, fasten their low-glazed hats on their heads with bonnet pins having jet-heads, sport jauntily the yellow and white cockade of their company, and stick nosegays in the buttonholes of their clumsy waterproofs. They pull up to a nicety, keep their heads in crowded streets, and their tempers under severe trials. Mlle. Curlier, who for seven years drove daily a dairy cart from Montreuil to the Paris Halles, is a first-rate "whip." Some confrère twitted Mme. Dufaux, who is sonsy and matronly, but pleasant to behold, with having left the baby at home with holes in its socks. Why did he not thus twit the women who drag costers' cars through the streets and cry "fish"? The lady cabby is a Mme. Ludgen, daughter of the Comte du Pin de la Guézinière. She fell in love with a professional tenor, and bribed her family to consent to her marriage with him by renouncing her share of the paternal heritage. The Combes law deprived him of the place of soloist at Notre Dame des Victoires. Their children must have come in twins and triplets, as she is still fairly young, and there are eleven. She was very much the Amazon in her tastes, in youth followed hounds, drove a team of ponies, and might have come out at a circus as a star of first magnitude. She tried last year to drive a cab, but failed. She is now qualified, and earns about 18 fr. a day. The cri de Paris of to-day is "Vivent les femmes cochères!" So be it. While a fair amount of good looks or comeliness lasts, they are very well on the box. But I recoil from the idea of age and snowy hair coming upon them there. However, they will not be more pitiable than dragging the coster's handcart in rain, hail, or snow.

A PEER ON THE PROGS.

[I have received the following from the noble correspondent who last week favoured me with his views on the reform of the House of Lords. In deference to the opinions of his fiancée, which do not, however, coincide with my own on the point, I insert it without further comment.—Ed., Truth.]

NOT having heard anything from you about it, I took it that you did not think much of what I wrote about the House of Lords last week, and would not want any more. But Jessie, who read it several times, tells me it was far and away the best thing in the paper, and that it would look dreadfully unenterprising if I did not send something else until I was asked for it. She said, too, that I ought to make it topical, and that the best thing I could do would be to give you my opinions about the County Council elections. As a matter of fact, I did not know much about them; I do not find them specially interesting myself, but my brother-in-law, X., happens to be a candidate. He ought to know all about it, because he is a director on two big electric companies as well as a motor omnibus concern. He is a Moderate—at least, that is what he used to be, but now he says he is a Municipal Reformer. He is not really a bad chap, if only his manner were not so patronising; and considering his directorship and things, I do not very well see how he could be anything but a Moderate, but I do not think his side are playing the game quite fair. When it comes to hiring the unemployed at 4s. a day each and sending them round with barrel-organs and notices that they have been ruined by the Progressive majority's buying cheap Austrian blankets and making bad bricks, it does not seem cricket to me somehow. In fact, it is one of the things that makes me think I must be a Progressive. For one thing, if there is nothing worse to find fault with them about than bricks and blankets, they cannot be governing London so badly, and one supposes that there cannot be, or the Moderates would surely have routed it out before now.

The things that really annoy my brother-in-law are the County Council trams. He said such a lot about them that I got quite muddled, and the only point he made that I can clearly remember was that they ought not to make people who did not want them and never used them, pay for carrying other people from Peckham and Tooting to and from the City at a loss. I have been going into the point with Jessie—who is one of the most clear-headed people living—and we have read no end of papers and things on both sides, and Jessie thinks differently about it. She says we ought not to mind lending a little money for a time—investing it, as it were—to give the working classes the chance of riding cheaply, and that after a bit the tram systems will make it all back again, and a profit on top of it. She says that my brother-in-law is the worst kind of Trust magnate, and that she would ever so much rather pay down money, even if it was all dead loss, to give poor chorus girls, and supers, and people a chance of cheap tram fares, instead of putting it into the pockets of my brother-in-law and his shareholders. I suppose I really ought not to agree with her; the profits on his Trusts and things really mean that my sister Kate has a good time; but I am beginning to find out that when Jessie says a thing it is right nine times out of ten, so, of course, I agree with her. As a matter of fact, though, it is only fair to say that she is a bit prejudiced against my brother-in-law, because when the news of our engagement was published my sister did not behave very nicely about it, and Jessie took it into her pretty head that it was all through my brother-in-law. It made things a little difficult for me, because, as a matter of fact, I owe the chap money.

What seems to me quite one of the most curious things about the County Council elections, by the way, is that the Moderates should nearly all be Conservatives and the Progressives nearly all Radicals. Of course, that rather set me against the Progressives to start with, because I do not think much of the Radicals myself. But Jessie says she can't see what Protection and Chinese Labour and the Reform of the House of Lords and things like that have got to do with improving London streets and having a smart fire brigade and seeing that poor people have got decent places to live in and cheap trams to ride on. So, although I am a Conservative myself, I don't see any reason why I should not vote Progressive, unless, indeed, my sister Kate makes a point of my backing up her husband. I cannot very well afford to offend her any more just at present, though, if Jessie got to hear of it——I suppose it will end in my not voting at all either way.

I am a very open-minded sort of person myself, and I was talking to a man at the club about it—trying to pick up points for this article—and he said something that struck me a good deal. He said he did not care twopence which side got in, because whatever they promise now he was quite certain that neither of them would make the rates any lower—he's noticed it dozens of times before in all sorts of places and countries—while as to the way they will spend the money, the Progressives have started to govern London on a regular plan, and if the Moderates got in they would just have to go on the same lines, whether they liked it or not. He said he had travelled a lot, and he had never found any of the foreign capitals nearly so well governed or so pleasant a place to live in as London is, and he puts it down to the Progressive majority on the L.C.C. But he is going to vote for Municipal Reform himself because he owns—or did own, I am not quite sure which—some shares in a music-hall that was knocked sky-high because the County Council insisted on their spending a fortune on the building to make it safe in case of a fire. When I told this to Jessie she said he was a pretty sort of reformer, and ought to be ashamed of himself. So between the two I did not get much forward.

I quite agree with this chap that London is just about the best place to live in anywhere. I always have been fond of the old place—though I was born in Gloucestershire myself. Jessie is a London girl. I know it is generally believed that she is an American—the papers always write about her as "the famous American beauty," and that she speaks with an American accent, and so on. And what I am going to say now rather bears on the cry about L.C.C. Austrian blankets. As I say, Jessie is really a London girl, through and through. And if you only knew her you would realise that a thoroughbred London girl is worth any half-dozen, or more, Yankee "beauties." She is a head taller than I am, she has the loveliest eyes, and—but, as I was saying, she was born in Camden Town. For a long time she couldn't make any headway in musical comedy, until at last her agent—curiously enough, his name was really Jenkinson, but he called himself Isaacstein, because he found there was a sort of prejudice against Christians in his line of business—he told her she'd have to be an American beauty. She went away from London for a bit, into a quiet village in Cornwall somewhere, and studied the American accent as hard as she could, and after that her agent brought her out as a Californian girl, and after that she never had the slightest difficulty in getting engagements, even before she became engaged to me. But it was really screamingly funny to read the Yankee papers when it was announced, and how they boasted about the beauty of American women, and ran down English girls, and that sort of thing. It is rather a queer thing, if you come to think of it, that just the same people who profess to be scandalised that the L.C.C. should buy Austrian blankets—which didn't happen to be Austrian at all, they tell me—should refuse to give a hearing to an English girl—or an English fiddler, for that matter—until some one makes them believe that she is a foreigner. But the County Council election is a puzzling sort of business altogether, and the only thing I can make out is that there must be a lot of humbug somewhere, and a good deal of lying.

LETTER FROM THE LINK MAN.

"ARE 'Gentlemen' gentlemen?" dear Lady Betty, is a question which expresses a thought that is present in the mind of many. It is a wise father that knows his own son in these days in the West End, when greatly altered political, financial, and social circumstances have so considerably changed the characteristics of modern "upper-class" men. The soft-voiced, courteous, considerate, and strictly honourable father is parent to the loud-voiced, blustering, heartless, and unprincipled son, whose character is a combination of all the worst features of Mayfair and San Francisco.

The latter are the men who most positively insist that the community must be governed by gentlemen. The advice should be adopted; it would rid the country of their injurious influence in the direction of public affairs.

* * * * *

Example is a surer master than experience; and example is a fast traveller in these days of newspaper enterprise, American journalism, general education, the telegraph, and the railway. Every class in England has considerably changed in the last thirty years, but none amongst us have been so greatly altered as have the so-called "ladies" and "gentlemen." It is no exaggeration to describe the West End as the birth-place of half the socialism there is in this country, for most socialists are not disorderly dreamers, but thoughtful men and women who are irritated by the unnecessary and serious inconsistencies of the social system. There is an inequality in iniquity which is insupportable. Vice holding the scales for Virtue, Folly worshipped as Wisdom, Justice obviously unjust: those are the ordinary characteristics of life in the West End, and they are the talk of every tavern in the kingdom.

"The Constitution must be maintained." Whose Constitution? That evolved by a class for a class in the distant past, and in altogether different conditions? Parrot-cry principles have had their day.

* * * * *

He who is drunk in a first-class carriage has had a fit; he who has a fit in a third-class is drunk. That is the basis of our system. "Give me title," "Give me money," "Give me social consideration," "Let me be in the first-class social compartment at any cost" almost all cry in England now—and for the purpose.

* * * * *

"Rome was not built," nor was it destroyed, "in a day." It is an inconvenience that this generation of English men and women has to endure that its members live at the period of the rapid transition. This once isolated nation is fast being welded to the European main-land. Our neighbours no longer all appear to be the "outer barbarians" most of our predecessors were convinced they were; they are not hopelessly iniquitous, idolaters, and shockingly ignorant. The Americans are not the scum of our servants' halls, a nation of which the women are dressed in shoddy silks and satins, and the men shoot each other at sight. Our Colonists did not all have a slum-made Adam and Eve for their first parents. Out of it all the English are learning that they themselves were insular, narrow-minded, ignorant, and abominably prejudiced. "We did great things in that condition." They will do far greater in the improved circumstances. The "gentleman" is our Jonah—but he has not the advantage of being a prophet. He hopes, however, that Protection will be his particular whale, who will swallow him and replace him on safe ground!

* * * * *

There is a peculiarity of everyday life in civilised conditions which appears to have escaped attention. The ordinary man, in London, for instance, has occasion to entrust his overcoat to an hotel, restaurant, or other attendant several times a day, and on each occasion, on recovering this, gives the man a fee. That works out an unexpected result. The overcoat may have cost nine guineas; four fees of 6d. a time amount in a year to £36 10s. At that rate, therefore, he would be paying four times as much for the temporary convenience as he did for the coat! At 3d. a time—the more usual fee—he only pays twice as much, which even still seems to be unreasonable. But an overcoat should last three years, in which period at the sixpenny rate the cost of feeing the attendants would amount to £109 10s.! That object lesson gives an insight into the amount of money which is now literally wasted in fees. There would be a saving of £20 odd in the time were a man to use his overcoats roughly and buy three a year!—Believe me to be, very truly yours, MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

ONE of the papers includes "the Duke of Bedford" among the plungers of the so-called Hastings era. The last head of the house of Russell that was given to gambling was the fifth Duke, who died more than a hundred years ago at the age of thirty-seven, through an accident. He was a member of the Jockey Club, and a constant habitué of Newmarket. The Duke won six Jockey Club Plates, and he three times carried off the Derby, and also won the Oaks three times. The seventh Duke of Bedford, who died in 1861, was a member of the Jockey Club for upwards of forty years. He raced as Lord Tavistock long before he succeeded to the dukedom on the death of his father in 1839. The Duke bred Habena, who won him the One Thousand in 1855. He also bred Asteroid, but did not live to race that good horse. Admiral Rous managed the Duke's stud for many years, and his Grace bequeathed him the choice of any one of his horses. The Admiral selected Asteroid, and sold him shortly afterwards to Sir Joseph Hawley for 1,500 gs. The seventh Duke of Bedford raced for sport alone, in the same way as the late Duke of Westminster and the late Lord Falmouth.

Owners of hurdle racers are waiting anxiously for Roseate Dawn, of whom they appear to stand in the greatest fear. I am told that this horse is to start for the £1,000 hurdle race at Hooton Park on March 9, and that he will afterwards be reserved for the £2,000 hurdle race at Auteuil on June 12. Roseate Dawn will not incur a penalty for the French race by winning at Hooton Park.

"There is no prospect whatever of betting being legalised." This is an extract from last week's Sporting Times, and I am glad to see that journal taking the practical view of this subject which has always been maintained in Truth. I have frequently asserted that the moon will fall before anything is done by Parliament in the way of legalising betting, and it is simply amazing to find some of the sporting papers seriously writing about such a chimera as the Government or Jockey Club licensing bookmakers and other will-o'-the-wisp vapour.

Last year's Grand Prix de Paris was a stake of £9,924 for the winner, with £800 for the second horse, and £400 for the third. This was a considerable improvement on the Epsom Derby, which was the richest of the English three-year-old stakes, and the winner of this race got £6,450 (including £500 for the nominator), with £400 for second horse, and £200 for the third. The winner of the Prix de Jockey Club took £7,360 (including £400 for the breeder), while the second horse got £600, and £300 went to the third. There were 432 entries for last year's Grand Prix, and 487 horses are engaged in this year's race.

Hitherto £8,000 has been added to the Grand Prix de Paris, with £600 for the breeder of the winner in addition if the animal was foaled in France. Next year the added money has been increased to £12,000, while the breeder of the winner (if foaled in France) is to receive £800 besides. Second horse gets £1,200, and £800 goes to the third. There are 576 entries. It is no wonder that the Grand Prix should have been so extensively patronised, for it is not only the richest stake in Europe, but it is also the cheapest. The liability for a starter is only £40, and an owner can "get out" for £4 by declaring forfeit about six weeks before the day of running. Mr. Vanderbilt is the largest subscriber, with twenty-three entries, and next comes Baron Edouard de Rothschild with eighteen, M. Ephrussi and M. E. Blanc have fifteen each, and ten of M. Blanc's lot are sired by Flying Fox, one of the colts being own brother to Adam and Ajax, named Agha. M. Michel Ephrussi has thirteen entries and Comte de Pourtales has twelve. As to the English entry, Mr. W. Hall Walker has eight of his two-year-olds engaged, including Royal Realm, half-brother, by Persimmon, to Colonia, and White Eagle, by Gallinule out of Merry Gal. Mr. W. Bass and Major Loder have seven each, this lot including an own sister to Pretty Polly; Auspicious, by Gallinule out of Astrology, and Simmerglass, half-brother, by Isinglass, to Galvani. Mr. J. B. Joel and Mr. W. M. Singer have six entries each, and Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Arthur James have five each. One of Sir Daniel Cooper's lot of three is Petrello, half-brother, by Gallinule, to Flotsam. Captain Forester has engaged the half-sister, by Flying Fox, to Ouadi Halfa, for which he paid 1,500 gs. at Doncaster last September at the sale of Lord Clonmell's yearlings. Lord Derby has three entries, one of them being Vedenta, own brother to Volodyovski, who is one of the best-looking and most promising two-year-olds now in training at Newmarket, and I hear that he will probably make his début in the New Stakes at Ascot. If, however, Vedenta should not then be ready for racing his début will probably be deferred until the Sandown Park July Meeting, where he is engaged in the £5,000 stakes by his breeder, Lady Meux.

I have just heard a most favourable account of Lord Falmouth's dark colt St. Martin, own brother to Quintessence. Only a mooncalf can think of betting on the Derby at present, but if anyone was forced to speculate on that race, a trifle on St. Martin would probably prove more remunerative in the long run than an investment on either of the nominal favourites. I hear that St. Martin will make his début in the Newmarket Biennial if he is well and fit, and probably a race of this kind would be of great benefit to him before he runs for the Two Thousand.

Sir R. Waldie-Griffith's handsome colt Simon Square, by St. Simon out of Sweet Marjorie, was one of the disappointments of last season. After winning two races, this colt finished second to Traquair for the Coventry Stakes at Ascot, and then he trained off altogether, and his later form was very poor. Simon Square is said to have made a prodigious improvement during the winter, and at Newmarket he is regarded as likely to become a most promising outsider for the Two Thousand and Derby. Simon Square has two engagements at the Newmarket Craven Meeting. In the Biennial he would have to give 12 lb. to St. Martin, and in the Craven Stakes he has incurred a penalty of 3 lb., so he would have 8 lb. the worst of the weights with maidens. He has over twenty engagements in the future, and if all goes well with him he is certain to win a good race next season.

Captain Homfray's Asian, by Ladas out of St. Ia, is a handsome and promising colt in the same stable, but it is no recommendation that he is own brother to Liao, who was a doleful failure as a racer after he had been bought in at two years old for 5,000 gs. Asian ran several times last season in good company, his first race being the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom, which was won by Traquair. He appeared to want time, and his only success was in the Chaplin Nursery at the Lincoln Autumn Meeting, when he won by a neck from Young Lochinvar, to whom he was giving 5 lb., and third was Donna Caterina, who (reckoning the sex allowance) had 1 lb. the worst of the weights with him, and three weeks later she won the Lancaster Nursery at Manchester, beating a large field. Asian is believed to stay well. His first engagement as a three-year-old is in the Craven Stakes at Newmarket, and he is entered for the Two Thousand, the Newmarket Stakes, and the Derby. This colt was bred by Sir R. Waldie-Griffith, and his present owner purchased him as a yearling for 600 gs.

It is curious that none of the Derby favourites are engaged in the Newmarket Stakes, the best public performer in the entry for that race being Linacre. If Simon Square goes on well during the spring he will have a good chance of winning this stake, supposing him to have made all the improvement which is claimed for him. The A.F. will suit Lord Derby's colt, Olympian, very much better than the Derby course. Traquair is entered, but he is not likely to distinguish himself next season except in short distance events.

Every day the papers print a number of betting transactions on the Lincolnshire Handicap, but all this speculation is wholly unworthy of the slightest attention, as the amounts wagered are ridiculously small, and the business only represents the harum-scarum fancies of foolish backers, who cannot be content to wait until stable intentions become apparent. It is quite certain that no genuine commissions will be sent out until the latest possible moment. Camisard is now favourite, and the French horse is more forward in condition than any other Newmarket candidate, but he has been backed principally for covering money from the Continental lists, and certainly not by his stable. The Lincolnshire Handicap will be won this year, not by the best horse in the race, or by the most favourably weighted horse, but by the one among the starters which is really fit to run. Scarcely a single animal in the list of horses which accepted is likely to be in anything like proper racing condition. The Lincolnshire Handicap, like most mile races, is usually run at a rattling pace from start to finish, and a horse must have done a lot of real fast work if he is to show to advantage in such an event. The training of most horses in the recent unfavourable weather has been only the sort of fuddling which is described as "useful exercise" and "kept moving." The number of horses which will be anything like fit during the first few weeks of the season will be exceedingly small.

I hear that Polymelus will be started for the Coronation Cup at Epsom, and that he will afterwards be reserved for the Princess of Wales's Stakes at the Newmarket First July Meeting. Polymelus would not stay the Ascot Cup course, and, with a valuable engagement waiting for him a fortnight later, he is not likely to run for the Gold Cup. I do not believe that there is the slightest prospect of Spearmint standing a preparation, and The White Knight will probably be the best of the English lot for the Gold Cup, as Keystone II. would not stay the course. If Sagamore is a Derby horse (as many good judges assert), he ought to win the Gold Cup, presuming him to be endowed with the necessary stamina. Sagamore's form last season was very good indeed, and he appeared to be likely to train on. Mr. Raphael made a wonderfully good purchase when he picked up this horse for 1,650 gs. at the sale of the late Sir James Miller's racing stud last April.

Mondamin (5 yrs., 7 st. 3 lb.) is said to be a good thing for the Lincolnshire Handicap ("another Mintagon") if only he can be got fit. I should imagine, however, that the odds are enormous against any horse trained in the North of England being in anything like racing condition by the 19th. Mondamin was bred by Mr. Douglas Baird, and he was purchased by his present owner for 580 gs. at the Newmarket sales last December. He was "weeded" by his original owner because it was thought that he could not get through another preparation, and I fancy that he had for some time been regarded as unsound. It was at one time hoped that he would win last year's Princess of Wales's Stakes, but he did not get through his preparation. A five-year-old maiden, which has been long regarded as unsound, does not seem a promising candidate for such a race as the Lincolnshire Handicap.

Fra Diavolo won three races during the last month of the season, having previously been defeated four times, but the class of his opponents was not high, and the merits of his victories seem to have been extravagantly overrated by the people who have been declaring that he will win either the Lincoln race or the City and Suburban. I have no belief in his Epsom chance, and he certainly will not be fit to run at Lincoln.

Queen of the Rivers, by Gallinule—the dam of Orwell (who is generally looked upon as likely to win both the One Thousand and the Oaks), has been sold to Mr. S. Joel, and she is to be sent to Gallinule.

An own sister to the Derby favourite, Slieve Gallion, has been foaled in Ireland.

Cinders won the Spring Hurdle Race at Newbury, as I had predicted would be the case. Mr. Clyde's mare won in a canter, after having made the whole of the running, and as Kolo was much fancied and heavily backed, the friends of the winner were able to get on by laying 11 to 8, after odds of 5 to 2 had been asked for.

It is very unfortunate that the King's horse, Nulli Secundus, should have lamed himself just as he had been got into prime condition for racing. The £1,000 hurdle race at Sandown Park on Saturday looked like being won by Nulli Secundus, who had been very lightly weighted, but now I do not suppose he will be seen out again for some time to come. When the King's horse has done with hurdle racing for the season he will no doubt be trained for the Princess of Wales's Stakes at Newmarket, in which race he will have the benefit of a 7 lb. maiden allowance. Polymelus will be able to give his Majesty's horse the weight, but, of course, there is always the chance that something may happen to the Cambridgeshire winner.

The subscriptions are full of Thrush, Persimmon, Robert le Diable, Bachelor's Button, Pioneer, Orme, Melton, Lord Bobs, Martagon, Count Schomberg, John o' Gaunt, and Desmond.

A correspondent who has just visited Newmarket informs me that he does not consider that Galvani has made much improvement during the winter, and he likes Baltinglass very much the best of Major Loder's three-year-olds.

His Eminence appears to be now the great Newmarket fancy for the Lincolnshire Handicap, but it will be quite time enough to think seriously of backing Lord Howard de Walden's horse when it becomes certain that he is to "go for" this race, and when he has been tried. Minos does not seem to be much liked, and Earla Mor's backers may look upon their money as lost, for he is not likely to run at Lincoln, and he will not be really fit until later on in the season.

As a youngster I remember that I was always disgusted with the way in which the various wretched little Greek States flew at each other's throats on every possible occasion. For that reason it always seemed to me rather nonsense to talk of the humanising effects of Greek art and literature. The Olympic games, with their laurel wreaths and side bets, were probably the cause of the friction. Human nature has not changed, and now when these modern Olympic games are being run periodically in different European countries as the biggest shows on earth, the sweet old spirit of squabbling is reviving. Next year these Olympic games are to be held Shepherd's Bush way, not far from the shadows of Wormwood Scrubs prison. The council has decided that Great Britain and Ireland are to be considered as one nation for the purposes of sport, and that all entries must go through the various governing bodies of sports in England. The Scotch terrier has naturally barked at the words, "Who said England?" The Irish terrier will probably follow suit. The athletic and swimming associations that control these bodies in Scotland are demanding direct representation. Unless this is granted they will have nothing to do with the show. Here is a chance for Lord Rosebery to rouse Scotland to frenzy. The Scots Greys are but a paltry incident in the national history compared with this affront to the dignity of Caledonia wild and stern. In spite of the Act of Union Scotland is Scotland still. Small nations like Greece, Denmark, Holland, Norway, and Sweden are entitled to direct representation. Where would England be but for Scotland? Why should the predominant partner compel the other partner to surrender his individuality in this way? The mere statement of the proposition shows it to be as unjust as it is inequitable. The national honour is at stake, therefore let the predominant partner stand or fall in the strength of her own arrogance. The hurlers of hammers, the heavers of weights, the tossers of cabers shall be absent. These are the sports of the strong men of the North. And why should the caber be excluded? The cestus is the sport of civilised man. The caber is the exercise of primitive man in the forest primeval. Even the pines upon Ida grew before the first stones of the Acropolis were laid. Those of the parts of Bœotia knew of the bagpipes and danced thereto before Homer sang. It is incredible that the ignorant Southron should have wilfully cut off the only race that could have given us Londoners an inkling of the first days of Olympia. As I have said, the show will be held within the shade of one of London's greatest citadels. The local colouring is rather depressing. It would be a thousand pities if the clans of the North did not march down with pipes and claymores to enliven us during this Olympic festival. There will need to be some novelty to make a gate, and the gate is the secret to success even on the way to Olympia.

The Oxford crew is a difficult one to criticise. It would have delighted Matthew Arnold. For the men are children of light, seekers after truth, searchers after the ideal. But withal they lack the brute force of the Philistine. Joking apart, my friend who put the matter in this way did really hit on the trouble in the Oxford crew. All the men are trying to do their work in the right way, they are all just as far forward as each other in doing every part of their work in the proper way, there is no big blaring fault that the coach can get hold of and eradicate and be sure that at the end he will have turned out a decent crew. They know what they ought to do, but they cannot quite do it. No doubt if there were a really good oarsman in the boat the case would be different. There would then be a foundation on which the crew could be built up. I very much doubt whether the crew will be a really good one, but I am pretty sure that by the trouble they are taking they are laying the foundations for the revival of Oxford rowing. Neither their work nor that of the coaches, Captain Willis and Mr. Harcourt Gold, will be wasted. With regard to the individual members of the crew, it is sufficient to say that Bucknall at two and Southwell at seven are the best oars in the crew. Their blade-work is good, and they use their legs well. The difficulty really seems to lie with stroke. He does not give six time to finish, and the consequence is that the end of the stroke is clipped. This affects the whole crew.

At Cambridge there has been another change in the crew. Benham has come up to row in the place of Hudson, who has had to give up his seat owing to boils. One never quite sees the object of a spare man unless he is a man that can be spared. He certainly never seems to get a seat if he can possibly be done without. If Benham is fit the crew should be a very fair one. They will certainly start favourites, and in all probability they will win fairly easily.

At Oxford there has been plenty of excitement in the Torpids. Magdalen bumped University, and went head, but their joy was short-lived, as Balliol bumped them in turn. Keble did well, and St. John's romped into crews and made their bumps very early.

on the success of their American billiard tournament. The last match was between Stevenson and Dawson. Both were at scratch, both had won similar matches this season against each other. At the end of four games they were all square. This was the deciding match as between themselves in this tournament. It was 9,000 up, and Dawson only scored 3,751 points. For a whole week Stevenson played consistently brilliant billiards. At the last sitting he made a record break of 702. During the week he had, in addition, made two breaks of over 500, six over 300, six over 200, and twelve over 100. These figures are more interesting than a Chancellor's Budget.

The M.C.C. has not liked to draw up rules relating to the registration of county players. It is not a pleasant job. It has been created by the business of cricket, and I should let those who make and lose money by having first-class county teams put their heads together and draw their own rules. It seems as though in first-class cricket no player should go on the field without producing his certificate of registration or of birth, just as a motorist has to produce his licence. If I had been the rule committee I should have passed some such rule and appointed an official inspector who would be dismissed if any player tried to pass by saying "Season."

The Oxford and Cambridge football match resulted in a win for the Dark Blues. Cambridge were the favourites in the press, and the writers are chivalrous to make excuses for the failure of those whom they expected to win. The fact remains that Oxford did win, and they owed the result to the brilliant play of their own half-backs, who broke the Cambridge attack time after time. Certainly there was a bit of luck in Oxford's win. One of their goals was lucky, and it was obvious that the Cambridge goalkeeper was suffering from stage fright. Nothing upsets a defence more than the knowledge that the goalkeeper is off his game. These were the reasons for the result of a good honest game. Thank goodness amateurs can play such a game. Unfortunately a certain class of amateurs and some professional teams do not indulge in this class of play. The press has been calling attention to foul play that is debasing football, but the authorities do not seem inclined to move. The fact is the authorities have something else to do. Mr. Clegg, the Napoleon of the football world, is to be reinstated as chairman of the Council of the Football Association. At least, so rumour says, and if this be so the massacre of the amateurs will be renewed with vigour. He has been thwarted once. He is a clear-thinking and high-minded gentleman who does not like amateurs and such canaille.

Another round of the Association Cup has been played. Tottenham Hotspur were simply routed by Notts County. Woolwich Arsenal must improve in front of goal. They could only just beat Bristol Rovers. The Second Division of the League did very well. Everton could only draw with Bolton Wanderers, and the Palace will have to replay at Brentford. London will be represented by two clubs in the last eight, and the Second Division of the League sends two more. Ireland has bad luck in International football. The Welshmen won by the odd goal in five, which they scored in the last minute of the game. At the Queen's Club there was a good crowd present to see the match between the Corinthians and the crack amateur Scotch club, Queen's Park. The visitors were beaten after a brilliant forward display by the home team.

Scotland was victorious over Ireland at Rugby football because the Irish forwards went to pieces when they saw their chances of victory being thrown away owing to the mistakes of their centre three-quarters. The Irish attack lacked finish, and McLean, their best player, was literally starved from start to finish. Scotland made the most of every opening and every blunder, while Ireland bungled when they ought to have scored.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

A GOOD deal of surprise and a certain amount of disappointment have been aroused in motoring circles by the decision of the Government not to attempt any amendment of the existing motor law this session. The surprise is not unnatural, since in view of the report of the Royal Commission last year it was confidently anticipated that the present law would be generally overhauled this year. For the disappointment there is, perhaps, less warrant. Let sleeping dogs lie may well be the motorists' policy in this matter. In the present condition of public opinion they are at least as likely to lose as to gain from further legislation. Time is on the side of the motorists, however, and given a reasonable attitude on the part of the police in the matter of prosecutions, as to which it is pleasant to believe that a better spirit is gradually obtaining, motorists have not very much to complain of in the present law.

All automobilists will be glad to notice, however, that there is some slight prospect of one very urgent reform getting attention at the hands of a private member—Major Renton having been fortunate enough to obtain a favourable position in the ballot for his Bill to render compulsory the carrying of lights, back and front, on all vehicles at night. Last year, it may be recalled, a similar Bill which was introduced was defeated owing to the prejudice and hostility of the anti-motoring section of the House. It is sincerely to be hoped that wiser counsels may prevail this time. It is, indeed, inconceivable that any one can be found capable of opposing such an obviously reasonable proposal. The present condition of affairs is anomalous in the extreme. In some counties lighting is compulsory while in others it is not, except in the case of motor-cars, which are the only vehicles subject to a universal law. The fastest traffic on the road, that is to say, is required always to show a back light, while the slow-moving country cart or market waggon, ambling along at a snail's pace in the middle of the road, and as often as not with its driver half asleep, is not. When the law is amended the same obligation should be extended also to cycles, which need back lights just as much as any other vehicles.

The Automobile Club has prepared a new system of handicapping for hill-climbing competitions, but the details are so complicated that one requires to be a Porson or a Todhunter to understand them, and it is extremely doubtful, therefore, if it will prove of much service to those, namely, the officials practically responsible for the conduct of such competitions, for whose use it has been designed. But the idea aimed at is excellent enough, and the general principle which has been adopted by the mathematical geniuses of Piccadilly seems perfectly sound. It is only unfortunate that they have not been able to embody it in a less complicated series of formulæ. The adoption of one universal system of handicapping is, no doubt, desirable, and the authors of the A.C. system are doubtless right in their suggestion that a well-devised system cannot fail to encourage the improvement of engines and transmission gear by the makers who study the results intelligently. The aim of the ideal system is, of course, so to handicap that when everything has been allowed for—gradient of hill, size, weight, power, and so forth of the individual car—the car with the most efficient transmission shall win; and analysis of some of the figures of last year's trials goes to show how enormously one car can differ from another under this last-named head. For the purpose of the A.C. formula, it may be noted, it is assumed that the efficiency of transmission from the engine to the road wheels should be not less than 66 per cent. This figure is sufficiently moderate, but even so, how many cars approach it in the ordinary way?

In his recent paper read before the Society of Automobile Engineers on the motor omnibus, Mr. W. Worby Beaumont had much useful advice to offer which it may be hoped the makers may be wise enough to lay to heart. His remarks as to the unnecessary size and weight of the existing 'buses were particularly sound. As it is the public are compelled to endure the racket of vehicles which compare with traction engines in respect of their weight and noise in order that the companies may increase their earnings. A year or so ago some very handy little single-decked steam 'buses were tried for a time on the Bayswater-road route, and appeared to give complete satisfaction so far as the public were concerned—being at once speedier, less noisy, more readily stopped and started, and in every way more satisfactory than the big double deckers. Naturally, however, their earnings were less than those of the larger vehicles, and presumably on this account they were taken off. Yet, as Mr. Beaumont urged, it is by no means certain that in the long run 'buses of this type would not pay as well. The argument is that they carry too few passengers to pay, but, as Mr. Beaumont pointed out, there is no law in existence making it necessary for the motor-'bus to carry passengers absurdly long distances for a penny. They should raise their fares.

Many friends of the wire wheel will be glad to see that such a weighty authority as Mr. S. F. Edge has been speaking up on its behalf. It is, indeed, a curious instance of the extent to which mere fashion and fancy and regard for appearances prevail in relation to matters motoring that the wire wheel should have been superseded so completely at the present time by the wooden one. As Mr. Edge points out, wire scores over wood in being at once lighter, stronger, more durable, more reliable, more easily repaired, and in various other ways. Yet because wood looks a trifle smarter it is almost universally preferred. Some years ago, it may be remembered, the Lanchester cars were invariably fitted with wire wheels, but in this, as in so many other details of that finely designed and original car, theory had to give way to fashion and wood to take the place of wire.

One of the minor troubles of motoring is the periodical necessity of parting with one's car for the purpose of adjustments or repairs. Of course, the ideal is for every owner to look after all such things himself. But then, every owner may not have the time or the ability, or the appliances, to do everything that is required in this way—time alone is an insuperable obstacle if he be a busy man—and hence it becomes necessary to entrust the work to other hands. Then, if the owner be one who takes a proper pride and interest in his car, begin his trials and trepidations. Once the vehicle is out of his own hands, it is at the mercy of the average mechanic's unscrupulousness, and the care and caution of months may be nullified by ten minutes' careless handling. Even in the case of the best regulated repair shops this applies—though less so, of course, than in those of an inferior order. Merely to note the way in which the average mechanic hauls a car about in the garage, turning it by the steering wheel when it is at rest, and so on, is enough to set the teeth of any sensitive spectator on edge. As to what happens later, when the owner has departed, perhaps it is as well that he does not always know. He usually finds it out later, however, on the road.

It is stated that good progress is being made with the arrangements for the introduction here of the Renard road train system, a demonstration of which was recently given at the garage of the London Motor-'Bus Company, at Walham Green. Probably most of my readers have seen descriptions of the Renard train in the daily papers. It is designed for use on ordinary roads, and consists of an engine and three or four passenger coaches or goods vans, or a mixture of the two as may be required. The great feature of Colonel Renard's invention is, however, that in the place of a heavy traction engine drawing two or three waggons, such as may now sometimes be seen on the roads, there is a light motor, from which, by means of a connecting rod running through the train, power is transmitted to the driving axle of each vehicle, making it practically self-propelled. The system is already being used in the neighbourhood of Boulogne for the conveyance both of passengers and merchandise.

Stock Markets Unsatisfactory—Exceptional Strength shown by Rio Tintos, Grand Trunks, and Mexican Rails—Kaffirs and the Elections—Why Investment Securities Hang Fire—The Tampered Investor.

THE past week has not added much to the gaiety of the Stock Market. Bright spots there have been here and there, such, for instance, as Rio Tinto copper shares, which have achieved the distinction for a £5 share of topping the 100; Mexican rails, which have again gone ahead on favourable earnings and a report that the company is saving at the rate of £80,000 a year by the adoption of liquid fuel; and Grand Trunk Railway stocks, for which investors have during the past Account shown a marked partiality. The firm undertone shown by the Kaffir market, too, is worthy of comment; certainly the Circus has received the news of a Boer majority in the new Transvaal Parliament with a confidence that would have been thought impossible not many months ago. But of markets as a whole the recent record has been distinctly unsatisfactory. Why there should continue to be so little elasticity about prices is to many people a puzzle. "Bull" points at the present time are not difficult to find. There is the wonderful vitality of trade, as reflected by our Board of Trade returns, by the figures of the Clearing House, by railway earnings, and by the excellent showings of our leading commercial and industrial companies. Again, there is the improving state of our national finances. The Chancellor of the Exchequer bids fair to have a surplus at the end of the financial year amounting to something like £6,000,000, a good proportion of which will probably be utilised in the reduction of debt. It is worth bearing in mind that already within the past twelvemonth Mr. Asquith has been able to materially curtail the amount of British floating debt, the volume of Treasury Bills now outstanding being only £9,700,000, as compared with 19½ millions a year ago. In the near future it is probable that the Consol market will benefit from the Chancellor's energies; indeed, official purchases of the Funds for redemption may have already commenced, judging from the several visits to the House paid by the Government broker last week. After taking credit, however, for these favourable circumstances, and for the fact that yields on high-class securities are at a higher level than they have been for some time past, it is necessary to study the abnormal situation that exists in the Money Market if we are to understand why existing stocks so persistently refuse to move up. Active trade, as I remarked a little while ago, brings its penalties as well as its blessings, and just now not only London, but nearly all the other financial centres of the world are experiencing a monetary pinch—the outcome of the pressing demands for capital to finance this widespread commercial activity. The United States has lately been a specially heavy borrower, having raised since the beginning of the year over $200,000,000 for railroad extensions and equipment, mostly upon two and three year notes offered at from 5 to 7 per cent. European capitalists are naturally showing a fair amount of readiness to take up these issues, for the security is unquestionable, while the return on the money is distinctly tempting. As a consequence, the United States' power to take gold from this side is increasing, and the Bank of England accordingly deems it advisable to maintain its protective 5 per cent. discount rate, notwithstanding that the reserve of the Threadneedle-street institution is now at the reassuring level of 27½ millions, or a million more than a year ago, when the official minimum was only 4 per cent. While money remains as dear as at present, and new securities continue to be offered in such heavy volume and on such attractive terms, it would be unwise to build upon any pronounced Stock Market revival. The general situation, looked at from almost every standpoint, is sound enough, but the investor just at present finds himself surrounded with offers of new stocks on terms that make many old stocks look unattractive. Just now the seller of gilt-edged wares at the regulation 3 to 3½ per cent. rates is hardly looked at. The West Australian Government, for example, offered the other day £1,000,000 Three and a Half per Cent. Inscribed stock at 97. The terms seemed generous enough for a strict Trustee security, but the underwriters found themselves saddled with the bulk of the issue, and the quotation for the scrip has fallen to 1½ discount. It is said that the London County Council contemplates an early visit to the Money Market, for a loan of five to six millions, and that the issue may take the form of 3½ per cent. two-year bonds, to be offered at a discount, with an option of conversion on maturity into inscribed stock. Another important financial operation likely to be brought off shortly is the conversion by the Japanese Government of the Six per Cent. Customs bonds raised during the war. It had, of course, been the intention all along to replace these bonds by Four per Cents., and for that purpose one-half of the £50,000,000 Four per Cent. loan of 1905 was held in reserve. But as things stand it would be impossible to place a 4 per cent. loan at better than 85, and even then its success might be open to some doubt. At the time of writing rumours are current that the Japanese authorities may meet the situation by placing 5 per cent. bonds instead, either at par or a small discount.

Treatise on Options.—Mr. Arthur Crump, late City Editor of the Times, described "Options" as "The most scientific and prudent way of operating on the Stock Exchange." This system, although very popular on the Continent and in America, is not so well known amongst Investors here as its merits justify. We have just published a new Treatise on this subject, which will be sent post free on application to The Secretary, London & Paris Exchange, Ltd., Bankers, Basildon House, Bank, London, E.C., or from any of its Branches.

Heavy Slump in Home Rails—The Bottom Almost Out of the Market—Traffic Returns—Goods Receipts Favourable but Passenger Takings Indifferent—Railway Traffic Pooling—The Companies' Policy Defended—Financial Effect of the "Berlin" Disaster—District's Dismal Position—Scottish Dividends.

So far as the Home Railway Market is concerned there still seems no turning in the long lane of depression. In the early part of last week the bottom appeared to have fallen out of the market, not the slightest resistance being offered to the selling pressure. There was talk about a leading House firm, closely identified with the Consol market, throwing out large lines of pawned stock, and with the dealers still very unwilling to increase their books, prices slumped in alarming fashion. Towards the end of the week the market showed a slight tendency to pull itself together, but on balance the falls are still substantial, as the following table shows:—

Traffics were again noteworthy for the wide difference in the results achieved by the passenger lines and those which derive the greater part of their revenue from goods and mineral receipts. This distinction is strikingly demonstrated by the customary compilation of the Railway News. Taking the traffic receipts for the week ended 17th inst., of fifty-three railways of the United Kingdom which make weekly returns, with a mileage of 21,155, the total amounts to £1,877,000, being equal to £88 14s. per mile. For the corresponding week of 1906 the receipts were £1,850,000, and the number of miles open 20,900, or £88 10s. per mile. These figures show an increase of £27,000 in the receipts, and an increase of 255 in the mileage. On thirty-eight of the railway companies whose returns distinguish the revenue derived from each class of traffic, the receipts from passengers for the week were £673,500, or £1,500 increase; and from goods £1,137,000, or £23,500 increase. The aggregate receipts for the past seven weeks of the current half-year amount to £12,971,000, or £264,600 increase. On the thirty-eight lines above-mentioned the aggregate receipts for the same period from passengers were £4,917,000, or £7,500 increase, and from goods £7,598,000, or £245,000 increase. So far, then, the indications point to a repetition this half-year of the experiences of the past eighteen months, namely, prosperous times for the "Heavies" and trade lines, and comparatively indifferent results on the part of the railways dependent mainly upon coaching receipts, which are still suffering severely from the united onslaught of trams, tubes, and motors.

As to the general market outlook, it is still necessary while the value of money remains so high to speak with great caution. The yields upon all Home Railway stocks are, as I showed in a table last week, higher than they have been for many years, and in the case especially of those lines that are steadily going ahead in the matter of gross earnings, there is little doubt that stocks are worth attention on the part of capitalists willing to buy outright and await the advent of cheaper money. But for the present, while our insurance companies and other leading financial institutions have their attention diverted to American short-term bonds and other securities offering alluring rates of interest, and the Bank Rate is maintained at 5 per cent. for fear of an American raid upon our bullion stocks, it would be rash to predict an immediate recovery; indeed, it is possible that values may yet go lower. A little stir was raised last week by the action of the Mansion House Association on Railway and Canal Traffic in passing resolutions directed against the recent combination entered into by several of the leading lines for the pooling of certain competitive traffic. The motions adopted characterised the combination as a violation of the conditions on which railway companies had acquired their statutory powers, as contrary to public policy by tending to destroy competition, and calculated, if maintained, to invest the companies with the uncontrolled monopoly of the carriage of merchandise, while the opinion was also put forward that undue preferential rebates and arrangements, especially with regard to the preference given to foreign imports, should be abolished. This is a sweeping indictment, but a little investigation shows it to be somewhat beside the mark. The agreement entered into by the railway companies a little while ago to pool certain traffic carried to Liverpool and Manchester—which presumably has stirred the Association to activity—was a well-meant effort on the part of those companies to do away with wasteful competition. The fight for traffic had become so keen that what with the expense involved by each company maintaining an army of agents and receiving offices, and the secret rebates allowed to traders, much of the traffic was carried at an actual loss. The need, therefore, for a truce among the companies was imperative. To speak of an arrangement whereby extravagant competition is converted into a fair and businesslike agreement as the establishment of a mischievous monopoly is to miss the point. If the companies were to commence utilising their combination as a means of unduly raising rates, the Board of Trade could be relied upon to promptly intervene, but there is no reason for suggesting that such action will become necessary.

From the mere Stock Market point of view it would be easy to exaggerate the importance of the wreck last Thursday of the Great Eastern's s.s. Berlin, off the Hook of Holland, which involved such an appalling loss of life. The maximum liability of the company for personal claims is limited by statute to £15 for every ton of the vessel's tonnage, or about £26,000. The boat was not at the time of the disaster insured at any marine insurance office (although formerly the company held policies at Lloyd's upon the vessel), but the Great Eastern makes very full provision in its own accounts against contingencies, the insurance fund for Continental steamboats standing in the last balance sheet at £145,000, and the steamboat depreciation account at £239,000. At the meeting of the District Railway last week Sir George Gibb was unable to do much towards reviving the drooping spirits of the stockholders. The company, although carrying nearly two million more passengers, or 6.72 per cent., and showing an increase in gross revenue of £13,500, was able to add practically nothing to its net receipts, the outcome of the six months working being a deficiency of nearly £50,000. The deficit, as usual, has been "charged to capital under the special powers obtained from Parliament." It is becoming a question how long this sort of thing can go on. The directors are doing all in their power to improve the company's position, but they are fighting against long odds. The recent increase in the fares—or, as Sir George Gibb more correctly termed it, the abandonment of a decrease—has done little to help matters. Incidentally the present overburdened condition of the company offers a timely rebuke to that unthinking section of the Press and public that so roundly abused the District Board because of its fare revision, and I was glad to observe the reasonable attitude taken up by Mr. Lloyd-George towards the deputation which recently waited upon him to demand cheaper workmen's fares. The President of the Board of Trade, in effect, reminded the deputation of the homely maxim that "you cannot get blood out of a post," and that for the Board of Trade to impose further impositions would simply mean that the railway company would be put into the Bankruptcy Department of the Board of Trade. The District, I observe, is badly in need of more capital, and the directors are being driven to the desperate expedient of realising some of their surplus lands in order to raise the wind. The first of the Scottish Railway dividends, that of the Great North, was announced last week. The company is paying 3 per cent. per annum on the preferred and 1 per cent. per annum on the deferred, or the same as a year ago. In view of the published traffic decrease of £4,700 this is a fair result, especially as the carry-forward has been slightly increased. The market is now awaiting the declarations of the Caledonian and North British, due on March 5 and 7, respectively. Judged by the recent heavy selling, more particularly of British deferred, the showings are unlikely to be very cheerful. Few people are now looking for more than 1½ per cent. upon British.

Renewed Weakness in Americans—Further Railroad Note Issues—Pennsylvania's Big Emission—Reading and Baltimore Prospective Borrowers—The Resumed Harriman Investigation—Currency Reform—The Aldrich Bill.

After the recovery of the previous week, due, it will be remembered, to a "bear" scramble, the American market has again broken away. The selling pressure was not as heavy as on the occasion of the preceding fall, because, for one thing, the market has already undergone a decline sufficient to make operators for the fall cautious, and for another, it is known that there is still a large "bear" account in existence. The controlling houses, relieved of the necessity for giving support to regulate the decline—a step that was forced upon them a few weeks ago—have certainly shown no readiness to buy with the object of initiating a fresh upward movement, and in the continued absence of the investing public, the market has made a natural response to continued unfavourable conditions. Business was, of course, considerably curtailed by the holidays on the New York Stock Exchange at the end of the week in connection with the Washington anniversary. Wall Street took two days off—one (according to the wags) for the celebration and the other to get over it. How prices have moved on the week may be seen from the following table:—

To obtain the key to the present situation it is still necessary to go to the Money Market, and observe the borrowing activity that is being shown by the railroads. Since the beginning of the year not less than $200,000,000 has been raised by the leading companies, mostly on the security of short-dated notes bearing high rates of interest. These short term obligations, excellent though most of them are from the point of view of security, have not got into the hands of the public to any great extent. They are being carried in large blocks by the banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions. As these issues increase, the effect must be felt in a growing congestion of the security market, and, with the hands of those who usually give a lead to Wall Street more or less tied, the chances of a revival in speculative activity become correspondingly less.

Two of the most important loans arranged within the last few days were $29,000,000 Four per Cent bonds by the New York, New Haven, and Hartford, and $60,000,000 Three-year Five per Cent. notes on behalf of the Pennsylvannia Railroad. A portion of both these issues has been taken up by capitalists in this country and on the Continent. The Pennsylvania issue, when first announced, was productive of some very pessimistic talk by the market, because of the prodigality with which this road has been adding to its obligations during the last few years. It was, therefore, a relief to learn that the proceeds of the issue, together with the proceeds of recent sales of stocks, will meet all the financial requirements of the company for the present year, and that it will, therefore, be unnecessary to issue the $200,000,000 of stocks and bonds which were to be authorised at the annual meeting in March next. The credit now obtained will provide for the constructional and other work connected with the new terminal in New York at the end of the Hudson River tunnel, and will also allow of the refunding of the $50,000,000 of notes which mature in November next. The notes were publicly offered on the other side last week at 99½. Another railroad which has just sold $10,000,000 of Two-year Six per Cent. notes on a 7 per cent. basis was the Tidewater. This concern is but little known here, but the fact that a line having the backing of people so powerful as the Standard Oil group has been compelled to concede such terms adds not a little to one's understanding of the present unsatisfactory condition of the security market. The Reading and Baltimore and Ohio are mentioned among other prospective borrowers. This rumour in the case of the Baltimore had a particularly adverse effect upon the company's stock, because it was published simultaneously with a very poor earning statement for January. Gross receipts for the month amounted to $6,365,000, a decrease of $208,000, and net earnings were $2,000,000, or no less than $448,000 behind the total for the corresponding period.

The earnings of the railroads as a whole in respect of both January and February are scarcely likely to be a "bull" point for the market. Not only will they reflect the recent big advances in wages and materials, but are likely to suffer materially by comparison with the previous year, because of the recent severity of the weather, which has lessened gross takings while adding heavily to operating costs. The winter of 1905-6 was unusually mild, whereas the weather through which the country has lately been passing has been most unfavourable for transport. Another factor that has a direct bearing upon the immediate condition of the Stock Market is the resumption that commenced on Monday of the Harriman investigation before the Inter-State Commerce Commission. Some hardy traders ventured to predict that the matter would favourably affect prices, asserting that Mr. Harriman's statements would resolve themselves into a recital of prosperity facts and figures that would provide "bull" ammunition. Perhaps the wish was father to the thought; anyhow, the underlying feeling over the investigation seemed to be one of uneasiness, and it was reported that Mr. Harriman himself had been preparing for the ordeal by disposing of considerable lines of stock in advance. The market is hopeful that the long-promised Aldrich Bill for the reform of the currency system will go through within the next few days. As I remarked last week, this is one of the few possible factors of weight that may be set upon the "bull" side. At the moment of writing the outcome of the Bill is hanging in the balance, an amendment having been offered which may cause the matter to be shelved. Time in which to decide whether or not the Bill shall become law is growing short, for Congress rises on Monday next. If no definite action be taken before then the market must possess its soul in patience until December, and meanwhile be prepared to face another autumn of monetary "alarums and excursions."

Canadian Pacifics Steady—Traffics Improving Again—Trunk Thirds Strong—A Trunk Pacific New Issue—Argentine Rails and New Capital Emissions—The San Paulo's Impregnable Position.

Canadian Pacifics have not experienced a repetition during the past week of the violent movement to which I referred seven days ago, but the rise has been fairly well maintained, and the market is not likely soon to forget the splendid showing made by the recent half-yearly statement. The traffic return for the second week of February showed that the line is quickly recovering from the effects of the recent spell of severe weather. True, there was a decrease of $34,000, but this was a much smaller falling off than had been shown for some weeks, and, moreover, the result ran against an increase of no less than $302,000 for the corresponding week of 1906. The Canadian Northern, I observe, actually showed an increase last week, the takings amounting to $82,000, or a gain of $2,500. The Grand Trunk market, after a spell of quietude, woke up towards the end of last week, when an active demand set in, more especially for the Third Preference. The dealers' expectation of an early issue of Guaranteed stock turns out to have been well founded. The issue announced on Friday night was not actually Grand Trunk Four per Cent. Guaranteed, but it was a 4 per cent. debenture of the Trunk Pacific, bearing the guarantee of the Grand Trunk, so that, as far as the junior stocks are concerned, the distinction is without much difference. The amount offered was £1,000,000, and the issue price was par, or a little under, allowing for the fact that a full half-year's interest will be paid on September 1, whereas the instalments may be spread until July. Redemption may be effected in 1936, or afterwards, at 105, subject to one year's previous notice. The money is wanted for the provision of rolling stock, and I observe that the Grand Trunk will be empowered to make use of the new equipment until it is required by the new railway. The issue, of course, means the putting of a charge of £40,000 ahead of Trunk junior issues, though this is a matter that need not seriously perturb holders of Thirds, in view of the very progressive nature of the Company's earnings, and the saving that will be effected this year in taxation. The latter item alone more than offsets the new charge.

The Argentine Railway market has again suffered to a mild extent from the effect of fresh issues, which have had to be offered on terms that made it worth while for holders of the old issues to exchange into the new. The recent placing of 5 per cent. debentures by the Argentine Great Western was a striking case in point. These debentures, almost a gilt-edged investment, were, it will be remembered, offered at par, and they can even now be bought at about 3 premium, thus yielding 4⅞ per cent. The new Rosario shares at one time afforded another instance of superior attraction, although there has since been a levelling up. The latest issue to disturb the market for old securities was that made by the Pacific, which allotted to its ordinary stockholders 100,000 shares of £10 in the proportion of two shares for every £100 stock held. The "rights" deducted from the stock were valued at 2 to 2½. In the Brazilian group there was cause for genuine satisfaction at the fine showing made by the San Paulo Railway in respect of the second half of last year. Contrary to the expectations of some people, although in accordance with the view of those who know the company's aversion to doing anything that would encourage Government interference with tariffs, the company has made no increase in the dividend, the payment, inclusive of bonus, being at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. But the appropriations have been of a lavish character. The sum of £100,000 has been placed to general reserve, £100,000 to rolling stock reserve, £35,000 to income tax reserve, and £50,370 to write down the company's holding of £550,000 Consols to 85, after which no less than £320,380 was left to be carried forward. Last year the distribution was the same, but whilst £100,000 was also placed to rolling stock reserve, only £50,000 was transferred to general reserve, £30,000 to income tax reserve, and £162,000 was carried forward. At the current price of about 214 San Paulo Ordinary yields a little over 5½ per cent. Although an "open" stock, the margin behind the 12 per cent. dividend is so big that the stock is really a high-class investment, and were it a little less "heavy" it would probably not return so high a yield. The 12 per cent. dividend has now been paid for six successive years. Taking the last six months alone, the sum added to accumulations after the payment of the £180,000 required as dividend, was £324,000. By limiting its distributions for some years past the board has placed itself in an almost impregnable position. The general reserve amounts to £746,400 and the total accumulations just upon a million sterling, which represents practically one fourth of the share (as distinct from the debenture) capital. The company, as is generally known, derives the bulk of its income from the carriage of coffee, and it is satisfactory to observe that the board has telegraphed

KAFFIRS AND THE TRANSVAAL ELECTIONS—RESULT MUCH AS HAD BEEN ANTICIPATED—A LITTLE IMPROVEMENT IN BUSINESS.

The volume of business in the Kaffir market has expanded a little during the past week. As anticipated, the Transvaal elections stimulated professional interest both here and in Paris, but so far as share values are concerned, the result, on the whole, has not been very satisfactory. Dealers laid in some stock in anticipation of the election results encouraging outside support, but their anticipations in that respect did not materialise, and, stimulated by adverse rumours as to Russian affairs, they hastened to lighten their books, so that prices relapsed. On balance, however, quotations do not show any material change, as will be gathered from the following table of the leading speculative counters:—

Share.	Feb. 16, 1907.	Feb. 23, 1907.	Rise or Fall.
Apex	4 1/16	3 13/16	- ¼
Consolidated Gold Fields	4 7/16	4 7/16	—
East Rand	4 1/16	4 1/16	- 1/16
Geduld	2⅛	2 1/16	- ⅛
Joh. Consolidated Investment	1¼	1¼	—
Modderfontein (£4)	6⅛	6 3/16	+ 1/16
Randfontein	1 13/16	1¼	- 1/16
Rand Mines	6 15/16	6¾	- 1/16
S. A. Gold Trust	2 3/16	2⅜	+ 1/16

Evidently the public is disinclined to increase speculative commitments in respect of Kaffirs pending a decision on the labour question by the new Transvaal Legislature, and it would seem that fluctuating markets such as we have witnessed the last few weeks are to be expected in the immediate future, rather than a decided and sustained movement in one particular direction.

The results of the Transvaal elections—which, by the way, render the past week one of importance in the history of the Colony—are quite as satisfactory as had been anticipated, considered from the point of view of those interested in Rand gold-mining securities. The Boers and the Nationalists have a working majority, but this is not regarded as an adverse factor, in view of the declared policy of those parties, and of the belief that the Home Government is more likely to be satisfied with any measures they may adopt in connection with the labour question than it would be with action on the part of a Progressive majority. It is a satisfactory feature that people in the Colony who are primarily concerned with the gold-mining industry are not disposed to take a pessimistic view of the outlook. According to cables from Johannesburg, confidence is felt in the future of the mining industry under the new form of Government, and the Transvaal Parliament, as constituted by the elections and nominations. It is pointed out that there is a strong Progressive minority. The result of the elections has removed one element of uncertainty in respect of the outlook for the mines, and it is to be hoped that the decision the new Parliament will arrive at in regard to the very important question of labour will also be in accordance with general anticipations, which, it may be added, are based on the statements made on the subject in advance of the elections.

DIAMOND FAVOURITES CONTINUE ACTIVE—DE BEERS PASS 30—JAGERS AND MARKET ANTICIPATIONS—RHODESIANS UNDECIDED—ELDORADO BANKET DEVELOPMENTS.

While in the generality of South African descriptions business has remained on a comparatively small scale, the leading diamond shares have continued to enjoy activity. In De Beers, in particular, there has been a good deal of business, and a feature of the past week was their passing the level of £30, the price (as I mentioned a few weeks ago) it was thought likely would be attained. The fact of this prediction being fulfilled is calculated to at least stimulate interest in the anticipations that are being indulged in in regard to Jagers. As I have already mentioned, a rise in the price of these shares to over £12 is being talked of, and I am assured that usually well-informed people share in the opinion that a substantial advance is likely. In this connection it is rumoured that the dividend due to be declared by the company at the end of next month is likely to be much larger than previous distributions. The amount predicted is 10s. per share, as against 6s. per share last September, and a like sum in March, 1906. On the week, however, Jagers show no change:—

Share.	Feb. 16, 1907.	Feb. 23, 1907.	Rise or Fall.
De Beers Def. (£2 10s)	29 1/16	30⅛	+ 1/16
Jagersfontein Def.	10⅜	10⅜	—
New Vaal River	7⅛	7⅛	- ⅛
Premier (Transvaal) Def. (2/6)	12⅜	12⅛	- ⅛

New Vaal Rivers have been a dull market, despite the official announcement that the company has received a sum of £22,000, representing six months' licence money for 42,000 claims, which shows that the company is deriving practical benefit from the recent discoveries on its property. The above sum, it is pointed out, does not include licence money to be received from small diggers on completion of the waterworks.

Rhodesians have come in for a little more attention than in the preceding week, but instead of this helping prices the general tendency has been rather unfavourable to holders, as the following table shows:—

Holders of Bankets, however, should be able to derive some consolation from the statements made at the meeting of the Eldorado Banket Company held last week. The property of this company—which is a subsidiary of the Rhodesian Banket—is shown to be developing in a very satisfactory manner; in fact, the chairman at the meeting went so far as to tell the shareholders that it is "a proved proposition of great value, and the new developments show there is every probability of the mine being much larger even than we have anticipated." It is hoped to commence crushing in May, and by the time the mill starts it is expected the quantity of ore opened up will represent nearly three years' supply. The Rhodesian Banket has a large shareholding in the Eldorado, and this looks like turning out well.

Westralians Receive Rather More Attention—Fresh Light on the Great Fingall Position—Deep Leads Relapse on Profit Taking.

Slightly more speculative interest was displayed in Westralian descriptions during the past week than in the preceding period, as a result of reports received from some of the mines, and, as I mentioned a few weeks ago, the condition of this market is such that it needs but little business to affect prices in the case of most of the shares. Both Associated and Ivanhoes have strengthened on favourable reports as to developments, and it will be seen from the following table of prices that both show a little improvement on the week:—

Fresh light on the Great Fingall position has just been thrown by an official statement in regard to the ore reserves. The general managers report that, owing to the very irregular distribution of values in large blocks of ore exposed in the lower levels, it is impossible to estimate the reserves of ore in terms of tonnage and value with accuracy. But on the basis of extensive sampling and experience in stoping, they are confident the present output can be maintained for two and a half years from the ore above the No. 13 level. The mine is now producing at the rate of about 98,000 oz. of fine gold per annum, and the last quarterly dividend was 3s. per share, but it is thought, in view of the reduction in the output that has taken place recently, the next dividend may have to be reduced to half a crown per share. Two and a half years' distributions at this rate would amount to 25s. per share, leaving a large margin in the market price for possibilities. There is, however, the prospect of the official estimate proving a conservative one, and shareholders are not likely yet to give up all hope of fresh ore of payable grade being developed at depth. Oroyas have shown weakness during the past week, in consequence of fears that the next quarterly dividend will be at a reduced rate. For this possibility, however, my readers have been prepared; about a month ago, when the price of the shares was 2¼, I expressed the opinion that they were over-valued. At a little under 2, however, they seem fair value, considering that the mine is likely to have a fair career as a low-grade proposition, and that the company has interests outside its Kalgoorlie property. London and W.A. Explorations have been marked down in sympathy with the fall in Zincs and the relapse in Deep Leads, but I look for a recovery in view of the impending issue of the directors' report and the expectation that it will announce the declaration of a dividend.

Deep Leads have given way on profit-taking sales, while some disappointment has been occasioned by the further news to hand by cable from the Loddon Valley, the latest values not being as favourable as those formerly announced. The best results, however, are not expected to be obtained until the deepest part of the wash is reached, and whatever the first tests of this may give, it will be some time yet before an idea can be formed of the results of working on a commercial scale.

Copper Favourites Active—Tintos Pass 100—Mount Lyell Position and Mount Morgan Prospects—Weakness of Zincs Depresses Broken Hills—Mysores and the Fire at the Mine—Nundydroog Dividend—Esperanza Ore Reserves.

Activity has continued to characterise the copper group. In Rio Tintos, in particular, a large business has been transacted, and one of the chief events of the past week on the Stock Exchange was the passing of the 100 mark by the price of these shares. In addition to extensive purchases by those who had operated for the fall in the expectation that the upward movement was unlikely to be maintained, there has been a large option business in the shares. For a £5 share £100 is a big price, but the last dividend was at the rate of 100 per cent. per annum, so that on that basis the shares yield 5 per cent. even at the price mentioned. On the generality of mining shares a return of 5 per cent. would be quite inadequate to compensate holders for the speculative character of their security, but the Tinto is removed from the ordinary run of mining enterprises in that its production is remarkably even and the question of life does not need to be seriously considered in estimating the value of its shares, the reserves being equivalent to about 70 years' production. Dividend prospects are considered excellent, not merely on account of the price ruling for copper, but also in view of the belief that the company's production is to be increased. A fortnight ago I mentioned the rumour then current as to an expansion of output being contemplated, and it is interesting to note that Messrs. James Lewis and Sons, in their mid-monthly report issued during the past week, make the following reference to the matter:—"It is stated that the Rio Tinto Company are erecting furnaces to smelt ore at the mines, sacrificing the sulphur contents in order to reap the benefit of the high price of copper on a largely increased production—reported to be as much as 12,000 tons per annum." As regards the outlook for copper, metal brokers report that, with the continuance of labour and transport difficulties in America, it is considered probable that for the next few months present quotations will practically be maintained, if not improved upon. The Australian copper shares have been affected by liquidation, with the result that prices have lost ground. I think the opportunity thus afforded to acquire an interest at a reduced level might be taken advantage of in the case of some of the principal shares. Among these I regard Mount Lyells as a promising speculation. A reader has written me a denunciatory letter regarding this company, one of the allegations being that its property is exhausted. But he gives no reason for his assertion, and apparently expects me to accept his unsupported statement in preference to official statements backed up by definite figures and by independent reports. As a matter of fact, the recent very satisfactory developments at the 850 ft. level of the North Lyell are calculated to prolong the life of that property (which supplies 70 per cent. of the Mount Lyell's total copper production) to five years, and who can say that the lode will not continue to still greater depths? Moreover, the company has other strings to its bow; it is building up a big business in superphosphate for agricultural purposes, and has tin leases which may prove valuable. The last half-yearly distribution was 3s. 3d. per share (dividend 1s. 3d. and bonus 2s.), or at the rate of 32½ per cent. per annum, and equivalent to a return of over 12 per cent. on the current price of the shares. Mount Morgan is another share which has been depressed by forced liquidation during the past week, and which is worthy of the attention of mining investors at the reduced level. This company is destined to become a big copper producer, just as in the past it has been one of the world's biggest gold producers. It has large reserves of ore containing gold and copper, and immense quantities of low grade sulphide ore, for which methods of treatment are now being considered. The company is now distributing at the rate of 9d. per share per quarter, or 15 per cent. per annum on the capital, which is equivalent to less than 4 per cent. upon the current market valuation; but it is expected that ultimately the shares will yield a steady return of 10 per cent. on the basis of £5. Some mining shares can be secured to yield more than 10 per cent., but the Mount Morgan, like the Tinto, is a much less speculative enterprise than the ordinary mining undertaking. The report for the half-year ended November last has come to hand during the past week, and it shows that while maintaining the regular dividends and writing £24,699 off plant, machinery, and property, the company has also paid off the sum of £75,000 temporarily borrowed, leaving the company free from debt. It is not the intention of the directors to make an early increase in the rate of dividend; with the increased earnings they propose to make provision for the additional works authorised and contemplated, and to create a reserve fund. This is a conservative policy which shareholders will benefit from in the long run.

In the Broken Hill group the weakness of Zinc Corporations has been the feature. The adverse rumours as to the process and the new plant have continued in circulation, and the fact that the board has issued no fresh statement has been made the most of by those desirous of depreciating the value of the shares. As a matter of fact, the officials, so far as I can learn, have had nothing to add to the statement they issued at the end of the past month, and they remain as confident as ever of the ultimate success of the enterprise. But it would appear that the persistent adverse task and the drop in the price of the shares, have had the effect of frightening some holders into realising their shares, and the weakness of Zincs has had an unfavourable influence upon Broken Hill prices generally. Last week I showed how the results of the Proprietary and North Mines had substantially expanded in the past half-year, and further evidence of the prosperity that is being enjoyed by the mines of the Barrier field is now supplied by the Block 10 Company, which has just declared a dividend of 3s. per share and a bonus of a like amount. This distribution of 6s. compares with 5s. in December, and 4s. per share at the corresponding date last year. Reverting to the Broken Hill Proprietary, it is worthy of note that the cabled summary of the meeting held during the past week at Melbourne contains the statement: "The financial position is stronger than it has ever been, and the board are of opinion that with £250,000 sufficient strength has been reached to provide a reserve for every reasonable contingency, and in future profits will be available for dividends." Thus an increase in the rate of distributions to shareholders is foreshadowed, and a purchase of the shares at about £5 should prove remunerative.

In the Indian group Balaghats have shown a better tendency following the recent steady decline, the view having been taken in some quarters that the fall was overdone. Mysores suffered a sharp relapse on news of a disaster at the mine, but since the publication of official details the shares have rallied, and it will be seen from the table below that they are only a trifle down on the week:—

One of the Mysore's shafts has been destroyed by fire from the 400 ft. level to the surface, and also portions of the structures on the surface. This will entail a temporary reduction in the output, but it is thought the leeway will be made up later by the treatment of ore rather above the average of the mine. The forthcoming annual report is expected to make a very satisfactory showing as regards the extent of the ore reserves. The Nundydroog has declared a balance dividend of 1s. 4d. per share, making 3s. 8d., or 36⅔ per cent. for 1906. This is the same as for 1905. Realisations have been in progress in respect of the Siberian issues, but West Africans have been steady. The recent dulness of Esperanzas, among the American gold shares, is now explained by the ore reserves statement just issued by the company. The mine is estimated to have reserves which should yield an operating profit of $1,480,000, or say, £296,000. This amount compares with an estimated profit in sight of over a million sterling a year ago. Allowing for the cash balance after payment of the January dividend, and for ore on hand and in transit, the total amount "in sight" works out at about 30s. per share. In view of the large dividends being paid and of the official denial that was given to the rumours that the supply of high-grade ore was giving out, the shares appeared cheap at £3, but on the latest figures they would be fully valued at £2 10s. apiece.

"Big Profits on Small Temporary Outlays."

"George Brodie and Co.," of 42, Copthall-avenue, E.C., have been trying to make people believe that it is possible to secure a certain profit by sending them money as "cover" on shares on which a dividend is about to be paid, the idea being that they will at least gain the amount of the dividend. New Primroses are the shares selected, because a dividend of 10s. per share is payable shortly. "The dividend alone on 100 shares will return £50 profit." Moreover, the shares "are confidently expected to be quoted at least 30s. higher during the next three or four weeks." I have already exposed the fallacy of the idea of being certain to net a profit by this process, but it may be as well to point out once again that the amount of the dividend when paid is deducted from the price of the shares, and—as is, indeed, the case of all operations on the "cover" system with firms of this class—the people who are most likely to benefit from such a system are the touts who send out circulars to trap the unwary. The talk of a probable early rise of "at least 30s." in New Primroses, coming from such a quarter, can only be regarded as an additional lure to induce the gullible to send along their money. It is a pity such people cannot be legally held to their statements—or restrained from making them.

German Lottery Touts on the War-Path.

The inquiries that are reaching me every day show that the German lottery ticket touts, who style themselves "bankers," are once more conducting a vigorous raid on the pockets of the innocent British public. It would seem, however, that in the mind of at least one of the raiders, H. Langenhahn and Co., of Bremen, a horrid misgiving has arisen as to whether the people here are quite so innocent as of yore. It is evidently realised that the persistent warnings of Truth must have the effect of curtailing the supply of dupes. H. Langenhahn and Co. are consequently now seeking to throw a little dust in the eyes of the public by enclosing with their prospectuses a leaflet purporting to be "A Convincing Reply to Newspaper Slander." In this they profess "to meet various erroneous opinions advanced by the British press, inexperienced as their representatives necessarily are in German lottery dealings." As a matter of fact, the only question to which they refer is the non-publication of the names of prize-winners, a practice which they defend on the ground that the winners themselves object to any such publicity. I do not know what other journals may have said on this point, but it has never been the sole or the principal ground of the criticisms which have appeared in Truth. It is true that I have frequently observed that ticket-holders over here have no guarantee of the honesty of the agents they employ in Germany—indeed, I have sometimes exposed cases in which winners have been cheated out of a large proportion, or even the whole, of their winnings. In the main, however, my warnings have been based upon the grossly misleading character of the circulars issued by the vendors of these lottery tickets. Scarcely one of their English customers in a hundred understands that the ticket which he buys first of all will not give him any chance whatever of winning one of the valuable prizes which bulk so largely in the prospectus. As a rule, this first ticket simply admits the holder to the first of a series of perhaps half a dozen successive drawings; and even if he has the luck to come out a winner again and again in the earlier drawings, the prizes in each instance are so trifling that they will only just suffice to pay for his entrance into the next class. Finally, when he has been lured on into risking ten or twenty times the amount he originally intended, the odds against his winning a really big prize will probably be upwards of 20,000 to 1, and possibly as much as 100,000 to 1. Quite apart, therefore, from any doubt as to the trustworthiness of the agents in the event of a prize being won, or any consideration as to the illegality of the business in this country, such lotteries really provide an extremely unattractive sort of gamble.

Abroad as well as at home the Britisher appears to be marked down as the natural prey of these German lottery harpies. Recently, for example, a certain Albert Jarmulowsky, of Hamburg, has been importuning Britishers in India to take tickets in what he vaguely describes as "the Great German Money Lottery." "Distance," he says in his circular, "is no hindrance," and the careful execution of orders for tickets is guaranteed by "the good reputation of his firm all over the world." Judging from the letters I am getting, Jarmulowsky's firm has no reputation at all in India. I do not recollect ever hearing of it here; but, anyway, my Anglo-Indian readers will see from what I have written above that they will be well advised to have nothing to do with such lotteries through this or any other agent.

"Vigilant's" Letter Box.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." Under no circumstances can I reply by post, and as there seems to be a misunderstanding in the minds of many of my readers, I wish to emphasise the fact that a coupon must be attached to every inquiry. A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.

2. Six different stocks are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks an additional coupon or coupons (one for every half-a-dozen stocks) must be forwarded. The answering of many of the inquiries I receive necessitates a great deal of careful research, and I shall therefore be compelled henceforth to enforce this regulation. Its necessity will be apparent when I state that some correspondents send lists of 20 or 30 different stocks covering every class and description of Investment.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

4. Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

5. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

7. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

8. I do not recommend brokers or solicitors.

Government Securities.

Headingley.—1. Brazilian bonds should be all right as an investment. The market is under a cloud for the present, owing to the friction that has been caused by the Government's action in regard to coffee "valorisation," but this is a matter that will probably be adjusted before long. 2. You do not get bonds to the nominal value of £500, but of £496 5s. Security, N.B.—The security for the Bloemfontein stock is quite good, and the decline in price is merely due to the present dearness of money. However, I see no objection to your taking the course suggested.

Railways.

C. P., Oxford.—1. The new Five per Cent. Debentures of the Argentine Great Western Railway should suit your purpose as well as anything I could name. 2. The company is doing very well just now, and there is room for a further rise in the shares. At the same time, the property is such a small one that the shares are scarcely an ideal investment. Riddle.—The matter constituted an anomaly, which you will see has since been rectified by a levelling down of the preferred and a levelling up of the "B" debentures. N., Enniskillen.—The company is properly managed, and the accounts you submit are correctly drawn up. According to the figures the company has now finally extinguished the debit balance on old revenue account, and is now in a position to apply any increase in net revenue earned during the current year to dividends on the share capital. The company, however, has still much leeway to make up before anything can be distributed on the "B" shares. Fac.—The stock might be worth buying to lock away, but I hardly expect much early rise. Fitzroy.—The dividend was a disappointment, but the company starts the present year under favourable auspices, as, given ordinary luck, it will save considerably under the heading of compensations, and should be able to pay not less than 2 per cent. on the deferred. I therefore think you ought to hold. Bruno.—Having held so long I think it would be a pity to sell now. The market should make a moderate recovery as soon as monetary conditions take a turn for the better. Verdant Green.—1. Burma Railway Debentures are a high-class investment, and the yield is accordingly only £3 6s. per cent. The ordinary is thoroughly sound, but you must not forget that the Indian Government has power to determine the contract in 1921, when the capital would be repaid at par, thus involving a loss to those who buy at the present price. Allowing for this contingency, the stock already seems fairly valued. 2. Yes. 3. The new issued Five per Cent. Debentures of the Argentine Great Western Railway, quoted at about 3 premium, should suit you. However, if you do not propose to purchase until June, better write again before making a final decision. Primrose.—The line is certainly being severely hit by competition, and it would be rash to assert that the stock has yet touched bottom. I think an exchange into Grand Trunk Railway Third Preference offers better prospects of your getting back part of the loss. Rancheros.—Thanks for your letter. I am always pleased to receive information from correspondents on the spot. At the same time I think you are taking an unduly pessimistic view of the stock. The line is in such a strong position that there is no question about the maintenance of the dividends, while its traffic is of such a varied character and drawn from so wide an area that losses made in one direction are likely to be made up by gains in others. Already since your letter was written the weather reports received here have been much more favourable, and traffic returns have begun to shape better. Amina.—Provided you are not putting too many eggs into one basket, I think you should avail yourself of the allotment of new shares. Sorrel.—I am afraid there is little prospect of any early recovery, and think it would be as well to lighten your holding with a view of being in a position to average later on, should such a course become necessary. Nos. 1 and 3 are perhaps the least promising of the group. Grand Trunk Third Preference would, in my opinion, be a suitable exchange.

Mixed Securities.

Ripon.—If you will be content with from 4½ to 5 per cent. you could get very good security by spreading the money over United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, Argentine Great Western New Five per Cent. Debentures, Grand Trunk Second Preference, and National Telephone First Preference. Ben Allen, Liverpool.—I would suggest spreading the money over Japanese Four and a Half per Cent. bonds (first series), Argentine Great Western New Five per Cent. Debentures, Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference, National of Mexico Railroad Four per Cent. First Mortgage bonds, National Telephone First Preference, and United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds. Carrots.—1. Hold for the present. 2. Defer averaging for the present. 3. The line is doing very well, and I am inclined to look for a further moderate improvement. 4. Worth keeping, though no immediate rise is to be looked for. 5. A fair speculative lock-up. 6. I see no particular attraction in a purchase. Arundel.—The bonds cannot be regarded as anything but a speculation, and I do not look for any early improvement. 2. A hopeful purchase for a moderate profit in a buoyant market. 3. Yes. Larne.—Divide the proceeds between Grand Trunk Railway Second Preference and National Telephone First Preference. The yield would be a trifle over 4½ per cent. W. D. H., Gateshead.—See my rules as to coupon and number of inquiries. Terrace.—1. Hold. 2. Fairly promising. Carter.—1. They are 10s. shares, quoted about 3s. 6d. 2 and 3. Fair industrial investments. 4. Chillagoes, Cosmopolitans, and Briseis Tin appear hopeful speculative holdings. Mooburg.—1. Not a particularly attractive investment. 2. A fair speculation for a moderate profit. Colonel.—1. A fair speculative holding for a moderate profit. 2. I have no special information. 3. I have not a high opinion of these. 4. Yes. See my notes this week. 5. I do not care to recommend the system. D. R.—1. The tea share does not strike me as being in any way attractive. 2. A promising speculative investment, though you must be prepared for the possibility of the price moving against you somewhat in the immediate future. It should only be a question of time before this railway enters the dividend stage. Bingo.—1. The stock may eventually make some recovery, but immediate prospects are poor, and by selling now you would probably have an opportunity of buying back at a lower level. 2. I think it would be unwise to average. 3. The profits have been on the down grade, and it might be best in the long run to cut the small loss, putting the proceeds into something with better prospects. Trylewood.—1. The depreciation in capital value is due to slightly reduced dividends. I think you might hold in the hope of a recovery. 2. Great Central Debentures are, of course, a high-class investment, but it is doubtful if there will be any early rise in price. 3. Given a better Kaffir market they would probably advance. Pompadour.—1. A capital reduction scheme is being carried out, and perhaps the concern may benefit. Too much uncertainty to recommend for a purchase. 2. Under the guarantee these debentures should be sufficiently secure. 3. The concern is controlled in Canada. A fair investment purchase. J. N. S.—No. 1 seems a fair speculation for a moderate profit, but I do not see much attraction in No. 2 at present. 3. I have not a high opinion of them. Grateful.—Suitable securities for your purpose would be Grand Trunk Pacific New Four per Cent. Debentures, Central London Railway Four per Cent. Preferred, Buenos Ayres Western Railway New Four and a Half per Cent. Preference, Atchison Railway Four per Cent. Adjustment bonds, Southern Pacific Railway Four per Cent. First Refunding bonds, National of Mexico Railway Four per Cent. First Consolidated Mortgage bonds, San Paulo Railway Five and a Half per Cent. Permanent Debentures, English Sewing Cotton Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debentures, Imperial Tobacco Preference, and Bovril Debentures. Vera.—1. After the severe fall I think the stock should be held. Even if the forthcoming dividend be as poor as the market predicts, it ought to be pretty well discounted already. It must not be forgotten that the last half year was quite exceptional, owing to the losses involved by the accident. 2 and 3. I see no reason to advise a sale of either. If you were to realise it would be difficult to find more likely stocks into which to put the proceeds. 4. Hold for the present. Soho.—1. Take your profit. 2. The railway has yet to prove its earning capabilities, and for the present you had better be content with the holding you have. Junior, Edinburgh.—1. I think them a promising purchase on the relapse that has occurred recently. 2. I would not buy options, as suggested, for the present. 3. There is a fair chance of some improvement, but the shares are a very speculative selection. Inexperienced.—I am unable to trace No. 1. No. 2 is not attractive. 3. A poor holding, and I have not seen a recent price for them. 4 and 5. These appear to be valueless. 6. Have a poor opinion of these shares.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Wales; H., Truro; W. C., South Shields; Clarence; Car; Demos; Motor Car.—The attention of these correspondents is directed to the rule regarding coupons which appears at the head of this "Letter Box." W. B., Burton-on-Trent.—I have frequently warned the public against Martin Bull. C. C. R. and T. D.—Thanks for the circulars. J. R. C.—Both Arnold and Butler and the International Securities Syndicate are firms of the bucket-shop class, with which you should have no dealings. G. A. A., Bromley.—See preceding answer. F. W., Bagshot, and T. H., Edinburgh.—It is certainly surprising to see the Arnold and Butler bucket-shop advertisement (without even any indication that it is an advertisement) in such papers as the Daily Graphic and the Scotsman. C. C. S. and A. K., East Lothian.—I do not recommend brokers. Anxious.—I am afraid that it would be useless for you to sue Bertram, Seymour and Co., even if you could afford to do so. C. W. C.—1. Not necessarily dishonest. 2. The National Share Exchange is a common cover-snatching bucket-shop. 3. Such cautions are constantly given in TRUTH. P. W. P.—A fairly good industrial investment. F. D.—1. No; have nothing to do with these people. 2 and 3. These are questions for a solicitor. Nestor.—1. Thanks for the prospectus and correspondence. 2. Yes, a fairly good speculative investment. Ottoman.—It would not be possible to enforce a judgment here, the business being carried on in Paris. Spark.—1. Apply to Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C., or the Crédit Lyonnais. 2. Lyons, Maple's. Bryant and May's, London United Trams Preference. Manor House.—A good industrial investment. Harfagr.—1. Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. charge very exorbitant prices for the bonds. 2. Probably you would. 3. On this point you had better take legal advice, and, if you desire it, I will send you the name of the Paris solicitor who has successfully conducted other cases against Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. 4. I do not recommend brokers. Peter Pan, Shylock, and Depositor.—The Charing Cross Bank is simply a usury-shop. Read the "Scrutator" article in this week's TRUTH. Z.—No; this so-called bank is not compelled to supply any such statement. Medicus.—I cannot advise as to the exact value of the "combination," nor can I undertake to say that you will be "certain to succeed" if you bring an action in the Paris Courts. See first part of answer to "Spark" above. Exor.—Yes, if the facts are as stated. Swansea.—A matter on which you should consult another solicitor. A. K.—United States Steel Five per Cent. Second Mortgage bonds, Weldon's Preference, Anglo-American Telegraph Preferred, and Bovril Preference would give the required yield. Spread the money so as to limit the risk as much as possible. Fredericus.—Buy National Telephone First Preference. You could obtain a yield of 4¾ per cent., and ought to have no difficulty in selling at the end of the period named. Sport.—The stock must be regarded entirely as a gamble. I am unable to speak regarding the results attending the directors' mission to the Government, but it would be as well for you not to be sanguine after the many abortive attempts that have been made for some years to arrive at a settlement. James.—1. Obviously I should be breaking my rule if I said they were a reliable firm. 2. Given a continuance of the boom in cycle and motor shares, they may go higher. If you see a profit, take it. Prospects.—In view of the further legislation contemplated it would be inadvisable to increase your holding, seeing that it is calculated to depress values. Port Haven.—All four would make fairly promising purchases at existing prices. Beyond being cumulative, I fail to see what "exceptional advantages" the preference shares in question possess. Earnest.—The rubber share is purely a speculation. The question of dividend payments is problematical. M. F., Portsmouth.—1. The present undoubtedly affords great opportunities, but you could, I think, improve upon the stock named. 2. I would not recommend you to average. 3. A recovery is not improbable before long. Fuimas.—More legislation is contemplated, and it may depress values still further. Perhaps it would not be unwise to cut the loss and put the proceeds into something more promising. Bordon.—In the circumstances you might face the loss, the possibility of any material recovery being remote. Oxonian.—1. I do not regard averaging as advisable, in view of the decline in profits. 2. They might be held for a possible recovery in the near future. Headmaster.—1. Nothing further, as far as I know, has transpired. Debenture holders will rank for something. A sale would be purely a matter of negotiation. 2. The posting of the dividend warrants is just announced. 3. I cannot advise you. E. A. J., St. Heliers.—1. In a better market they may advance. They are a pure gamble. 2. The shares would make a fair commercial investment. Macer.—The shares scarcely appear attractive. Rather than benefit, the company will suffer from the rise in tea prices. Knocknagee.—None appear particularly promising "speculative" investments at existing prices, though, given prosperity in the industry, 1, 3, and 6 might be established on a slightly higher level. 8. A gamble, in view of the chaotic position of affairs and the uncertainties of the future. Cicero.—Of their type they are tolerably fair. Bogey.—1. An American concern, of which very little is known on this side. 2. Somewhat speculative, but it is believed they will go higher ultimately. Simple Simon.—The preference share prospectus of the Kent Coal Concessions, Limited, is a most unsatisfactory document. It does not give the names of the directors or officials of the company and such particulars as are supplied in relation to the numerous contracts with syndicates and individuals (including Mr. Arthur Burr) are extremely bewildering. I think you would be very foolish to take any of the shares. S. J. C., Isleworth.—See TRUTH of June 23, 1904. As to the insurance company, I have more than once commented unfavourably upon its terms and methods of business, and I propose to do so again at an early date. A. M. W.—I did not recognise the name of the concern in your previous letter. It was, I find, dealt with in the "Entre Nous" columns of TRUTH on October 3, 1906.

INSURANCE.

Fuimus.—I hope to deal with the whole question in my insurance notes in an early issue. Argyll.—The prospects are distinctly good, and considerably improved by amalgamation. J. B.—The society is apparently bona fide, but I should not advise joining it. I may have something to say about it soon, and will return your enclosure in due course. Investor.—An investment in the shares of the new British Security Insurance Company would be highly speculative.

MINES.

Cartor.—1 and 2. I have by no means a high opinion of the shares, and think you should take what you can get for them. 3. Do you refer to the system of dealing in options or to a particular share? Mining Fraud.—On what do you base your statements? See my notes this week. S. G. C.—There appears little prospect of much recovery in the price, and you had better exchange into something more promising. E. N.—They appear a promising speculative holding. Belmont.—1. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a mine, but there appears no reason to sell at present. 2. As at the most you could only get a few pence for the shares, you may as well keep them on the chance of something turning up. Hove.—The last I heard respecting this concern was that its expedition had been refused permission to land on the island on which the diamonds were said to exist.

Bandbox.—The offices of the Broken Hill South Blocks are at Salisbury House, E.C. The company has no connection with Block 14. South Blocks shares I consider a promising holding. Qui Vive.—Since you wrote it has been resolved to wind up Niekerk, Limited, voluntarily.

INDUSTRIALS GENERALLY DULL—A BOOM IN TEA SHARES—BREWERIES STILL DEPRESSED—PROSPEROUS DYERS—"BAYS" BUOYANT AGAIN.

The more cheerful prospect which seemed to be opening out in the miscellaneous market soon faded away, and the prevailing condition is again one of melancholy dulness. From almost every section comes the same story of the absence of public interest. The most notable exception to the rule has been supplied by the demand for the shares of Indian and Ceylon tea-growing companies. Through a combination of factors, including an increased Russian and American consumption of Indian tea, a sharp rise in price has occurred, and quite a little boom in the shares of the companies has sprung up. Assams have advanced 3 points to 38-40, and Dooars ordinary 2 points to 20½-21½. The former would yield on the last dividend 4 per cent., and the latter 6¼ per cent. Jorehauts, Tokais, and Empires are among the other Indian shares which have gone up, whilst in Ceylons, Alliance ordinary, Ceylon Plantations, and Eastern Produce and Estates have been in request. The issues of companies concerned in both tea and rubber production have been particularly buoyant, Anglo-Ceylon stock reaching 130. In marked contrast to this boomlet in tea shares is the continued depression of brewery stocks. No doubt this is mainly due to apprehensions in regard to the effect of forthcoming legislation, though in the long run it will not improbably turn out that the injury to the trade in that direction has after all been considerably exaggerated. Recent reports have varied enormously as to the actual state of the trade, but some, at least, of the companies are doing a good business, and at the existing quotations many of the shares provide a yield high enough to cover any real risk of depreciation. The directors of Ind, Coope, and Co. recommend that at the meeting on Friday a committee of shareholders shall be appointed to assist in preparing a scheme for reorganising the capital of the company. A substantial writing-down is contemplated, but the heaviest portion of the loss will fall upon the holders of the ordinary shares, which are held by the directors and their families, who received nothing in respect of goodwill when the company was formed twenty-one years ago. While this necessary step is to be taken to place the company's finances on a sounder basis, it is to be noted that last year's profits showed a large increase on those for 1905. The report of Meux's Brewery Company shows an improvement in the results of the year's trading. The difficulty of the huge deficiency of £805,000 revealed by the balance-sheet, which created such a sensation twelve months ago has, however, still to be faced, and the directors now ask the shareholders to agree to the drastic course of writing £98 off each £100 ordinary share and £6 off each £10 preference share.

In the textiles section the chief event of the week was the publication of the very satisfactory report of the Bradford Dyers' Association, the results for the past year being the best that have been achieved since the company was formed in 1898. Practically the whole of the Bradford dyers are comprised in this combination, which was started with a capital of £3,000,000, since increased by further issues to £4,810,227. In 1900 the company paid 9 per cent. on its ordinary shares, and in every other year before and since the dividend has been 7 per cent. Last year the profits reached £366,086, as compared with £342,279 in 1905, and £20,000 is added to the reserve fund, which now stands at £285,372, and £60,000 to the depreciation fund, now brought up to £331,764. In view of the remarkable prosperity of the cotton and woollen industries the prospects of this concern for the current year are exceedingly bright, and its securities appear to constitute a sound industrial investment. At current prices the ordinary shares yield over 5¾ per cent., while the return on the preference is almost 4¾. There was a slight momentary reaction in motor and cycle shares after the recent advances, but the week closed without any conspicuous changes. Nitrates have recently been exhibiting an improvement as the outcome of a continuous advance in the price of nitrate of soda. Hudson's Bays have been steadily recovering from the recent fall, and are now seven points higher than a fortnight ago.

VIGILANT.

THE KENWIG STREET MURDER.

IT is a matter of congratulation, both to my readers and also to myself, that, out of more than a thousand competitors, only four have written to criticise the award announced last week. Moreover, even of these four, three are entirely friendly criticisms, and only one is in any degree hostile. I think it will be generally agreed that these figures speak for themselves, and are an eloquent tribute to the impartiality of the jury of experts who sat in judgment on the solutions.

I do not propose to deal with my four critics in detail, or to discuss with them any points that would involve the reopening of res judicata. The case has been decided under conditions as fair and square as it was possible to make them, and there it must rest. But there is one point mentioned by two of my critics to which I can, with propriety, refer. The point is this: that the fact of having a standard solution cut and dried reduces a competition of this sort to something in the nature of a lottery, by debarring all solutions, which however excellent per se, do not happen to hit upon the precise explanation given by the author—in short, that the elements of chance and conjecture enter too largely into the matter.

One of the critics who raises this point acknowledges, in the most candid and courteous manner, that, as that was one of the conditions laid down, and all competitors had fair warning of it, he does not make any retrospective complaint, but merely brings the matter to my notice in order that I may have it before me in formulating the conditions of any future puzzle. I have only to assure this gentleman that I accept his criticism in the spirit in which it is offered, and that, when occasion next arises, I will give it my careful consideration. How soon that will be, I am not in the position now to announce. But, at any rate, it will not be long. And I think I can promise my readers that the next "Queer Story" Puzzle will be at least as interesting as that of the Kenwig Street Murder, to which, in their name and my own, I now bid a final adieu.

I ought to mention that I have not yet received applications for their prizes from the first and second prize-winners.

QUEER STORY.

LENTEN OBSERVANCE.

FROM time to time we find newspapers discussing the question, why men do not go to church. I have often thought that a debate at least as interesting might be got out of the converse question, why men do go to church, since, while not denying for a moment that many men go from real religious conviction, one cannot blind one's eyes to the fact that there are others whose motives are by no means so exalted.

Ted Bandon belonged to this latter class. Far from churchily inclined, he first started going to church, not with a religious, but merely with an amatory object. That is to say, he became a regular member of the congregation of St. Cyprian's, Further Green, for the simple reason that Cecilia Graylands was a constant and devout frequenter of that ritualistic place of worship.

Cecilia Graylands took herself and her churchwomanship seriously. Although exceedingly pretty, and of an age when a touch of worldly frivolity in her might have been considered venial, she devoted herself entirely to things ecclesiastical. Steeped to her finger-tips in Church history, a regular devourer of High Church literature and journalism, she could argue an abstruse doctrine, or a nice question of ceremonial, with all the technical knowledge and ability of a Consistory Court. No priest of the Church was better versed than she in the proper etiquette of vestments or the precise amount of observance due to any given Black Letter saint. She was a sort of walking Churchman's Almanack of all the fasts and feasts and vigils in the Calendar. To these externals of religion she attached a perhaps exaggerated importance, as those of her school are often inclined to do. For instance, to eat meat on a fast-day was regarded by her as a sin comparable with lying or thieving. But, with all her perverted prejudices in this direction, it cannot be denied that she lived, in practice, a very pious life, and, according to her lights, was an exemplary Christian.

Such was the girl to whom Ted Bandon, the good-natured, the easy-going, the frankly mundane, lost his heart. It was a bad case, too—a case of love in its most malignant form. Unless he could win her for his wife, life was no longer worth living to him. He must win her. He would win her. And he set himself resolutely to achieve that object.

But, from the first, it was clear to him that, before he could have any earthly chance with Cecilia, he must first altogether change his way of life. A man who seldom went to church on Sundays, and never on week days, a man who had little or no respect for "authority," a man, in short, who lived his life without reference to his spiritual Mother, would surely be regarded by the fair Cecilia as anathema maranatha. She would shrink with horror from the idea of marrying such a person, and would doubtless reject his offer, if he ever got so far as to propose, by quoting St. Paul on the subject of being unequally yoked with unbelievers.

No! There was only one channel through which Cecilia could be approached—the High Church channel. He must become a Ritualist, and accept all the consequences of adopting that creed. He must go to church, not only on Sundays, but on one or two evenings in the week as well. That, however, he did not mind, lazy and slack in such observances as he naturally was. Indeed, about this time he would have gone anywhere where he was certain to meet Cecilia, and have the opportunity of escorting her home afterwards.

You must not be too severe in your strictures on Ted Bandon for thus taking up with religion from ulterior motives. Judged by ordinary standards, such a thing, I grant you, is despicable. But when a man is in love, he cannot be judged by ordinary standards. He is a law unto himself.

Well, the affair prospered. He gradually won his way into the favour of Cecilia, who did not in the least doubt the sincerity of his religious devotion, with the result that he presently became engaged to her and ultimately led her to the altar of St. Cyprian's. So far, so good. But now his punishment began.

There is an old saying that it is easier to form undesirable acquaintanceships than to drop them when once formed. And with equal truth it may be asserted that it is easier to assume the cloak of Ritualism than to doff it when once assumed. This is more particularly the case with an easy-going man, whom the very infirmity, by which he has been betrayed into the former, naturally unfits to display that moral courage which is requisite for the latter. Most of all is it the case with a man, who, having put on such a cloak in order to win a charming wife, finds after marriage that he cannot now lay it aside without entirely forfeiting her respect and affection.

Such a man—if his wife's love and good opinion are matters of the first importance to him, as they were to Bandon—is practically forced into keeping up the sham, in spite of himself. This Ted found. In fact, in a mild sort of way, his position was like that of the unhappy creator of Frankenstein. He had called into existence a bugbear which he could not destroy—the irksome bugbear of being tied and bound for the rest of his days by the galling chain of ecclesiastical servitude.

For Cecilia it was different. She had always been used to submit herself to sacerdotal authority. She liked it. She gloried in it. She believed that she was thereby fulfilling the highest spiritual law. Frequent attendance at Church was to her no less a pleasure than it was a duty. Fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays, if not exactly a pleasure, afforded her at least the satisfaction of mens sibi conscia recti. But even that satisfaction was denied the unhappy Ted. To him the pain of an empty stomach carried with it no consoling sense of suffering bravely endured in a righteous cause; for the good reason that he most emphatically did not believe in fasting as a salutary religious exercise, nor see either sense or virtue in going hungry when there was plenty of food to be had.

Ted Bandon found the ordinary Wednesday and Friday fasting bad enough—so bad, indeed, that it was often on the tip of his tongue to suggest beafsteak and jam roll for dinner instead of salt fish and sago pudding. But the horror, which he knew such a suggestion would arouse in Cecilia, always deterred him from giving verbal expression to it. But the worst time of all began with the arrival of Lent—the first Lent after his marriage. Hitherto Lent had been little more than a name to him. But now it became a very stern reality. Ash Wednesday gave him a foretaste of what to expect. There was nothing to eat all day, except the stereotyped salt fish and sago pudding. Now, Bandon hated salt fish, and he detested sago. So he lunched and dined mostly off dry bread (butter was taboo), and went to bed that night exceedingly hungry.

His discomfort, it may be said, had been not a little aggravated in the course of the day by an uncommonly savoury smell emanating from the kitchen. It appeared that the servants—happy, independent creatures, thought Bandon—had absolutely struck at a fish diet, and had threatened to leave unless they were provided with their usual dinner and supper of butcher's meat. It was in vain that Cecilia had appealed to their better feelings. The cook maintained, almost rudely, that neither she nor her fellow-domestics held with such ways. Of course, if her master and missus liked to starve theirselves, she hadn't nothing to say agin that. But Lent or no Lent, she'd always been accustomed to beef and mutton, and beef and mutton she'd have. And 'Liza and Mary Anne were of the same opinion.

Cecilia had, in the end, deemed it policy to yield to the strikers. Her servants were, on the whole, satisfactory, and she knew the paramount difficulty of getting others. So they were mollified that Ash Wednesday by the indulgence of an Irish stew. It was the smell of this stew that so aggravated the sufferings of Ted Bandon. There were his servants sitting down to a savoury meat repast, while he, their master, was half starving on dry bread. It was a cruel thing—apart from being quite out of character. But he dared not say a word, for fear of hurting his beloved Cecilia and forfeiting her good opinion.

As Lent advanced, however, he found the process of semi-starvation to which he was subjected more and more galling, until, at length, his lust for butcher's meat became so overwhelming that he could withstand it no longer. Beef or mutton, pork or veal, he must have. He must have it or die! But how to do so without Cecilia's knowledge? The Tempter, ever ready to aid and abet such nefarious desires, soon whispered in his ear an easy way.

Easy? Yes, indeed, easy enough; and reprehensible in proportion. For it was nothing else than to satisfy his base lust for meat under the cloak of religious self-denial. There was a mission to men on just then, in which the Vicar of St. Cyprian's was inviting the co-operation of the male members of his flock, asking them to spend their evenings (while the mission lasted) in scouring the streets, the alleys, and the public-houses with a view to gathering in the prodigals. A noble work. Far too noble, indeed, to be prostituted to the uses of animal self-indulgence. Yet Ted Bandon, in his desperate hunger, stooped to the hypocrisy of such a course. And thus he introduced the subject to his unsuspecting wife:—

"My dear," said he, one morning, as they sat at breakfast, "I have been thinking over what the Vicar said at church last night, and I feel that I really ought to do what he asks—I mean, go out of an evening into the streets and public-houses and try to get men to come into the mission."

"Oh, Ted! How good of you!" exclaimed Cecilia, beaming upon him in pious admiration.

"Tut, tut! Not at all. It is nothing more than my duty," answered Bandon, hastily, conscious, as he spoke, of an uncomfortably guilty flush, which he hoped his wife would not notice.

Cecilia did notice the flush, but (fortunately for him) she assigned it to an entirely different cause—the natural and laudable bashfulness of a modest Christian who deprecates being complimented on his good works. And she beamed at Bandon all the more admiringly.

"As there is no time like the present, my dear," he went on, trying desperately hard to look the part he was thus hypocritically assuming, "I think I will make a start this evening."

His wife, evidently suspecting nothing, nodded and smiled her entire approval.

You can see, of course, what Bandon's little game was. He meant, while absent from home on the work of the mission, to seize the opportunity of adjourning to some safely remote restaurant, and there enjoy a good square meal. For this iniquity, aggravated by deceit, he tried to salve his conscience by the plea that he would spend part of his evenings in genuine mission work, only devoting quite a small fraction of it to the claims of Little Mary. The excuse was flimsy, but it served as well as any other. Nor must you judge Bandon too severely. A hungry man, with a healthy appetite, who (except on Sundays) has not tasted meat for three weeks, and who is driven to satisfy his craving at the expense of his probity, should only be condemned with extenuating circumstances. In measuring the crime you must also measure the provocation, and regarded as a provocation to a reckless "bust," three solid weeks of salt fish and sago pudding must be allowed to rank high.

Bandon left home at seven that evening on his missionary enterprise. He returned about eleven. This is how he had really parcelled out his time: Five minutes in walking to the nearest tram connection; fifteen minutes by car to a neighbourhood where he was not known; forty minutes at a restaurant, spent in discussing three successive succulent mutton chops and a pint of Bollinger; fifteen minutes by car back to the scene of parochial operations; and the balance of the time devoted to genuine mission work. Thus he spent his first "evening out" in the local mission field; and thus he spent many subsequent evenings. The fact of its being a mission to men only rendered his little game safe and easy. Cecilia was debarred, by her sex, from accompanying him, as she would otherwise doubtless have wished to do, and remained behind quietly at home. And certainly it was much to Cecilia's credit that, though she must have found these long hours of solitude uncommonly dull, she was careful to dissemble her feelings in Ted's presence—for fear, no doubt, of seeming to act as a damper on his missionary zeal. Indeed, so far did her sense of duty lead her to carry this pious dissimulation, that a casual observer, seeing the cheery smile with which she sped her husband on his nightly outings, might have been deluded into the unwarrantable belief that she really was not sorry for a short respite from his society—which was, of course, a ridiculous supposition.

But those evenings out, though they enabled Bandon to satisfy his craving for beef and mutton, and so brought him ease of body, nevertheless fatally impaired his peace of mind. Indeed, how should any man, not utterly callous, enjoy peace of mind while he is engaged in meanly deceiving a beloved and confiding wife? Day by day the stings of conscience grew sharper and sharper. They reacted on his physical system. His appetite failed him. The mutton chop at the restaurant lost its succulence, the steak its flavour, the Bollinger its bouquet. He became moody, depressed; and, despite his utmost efforts to shake it off, "black care" sat tight behind him.

It was his tenth evening of unlawful indulgence, and Ted sat staring at the untasted pork before him, roasted though it was to a turn, and the crackling, a very dream of crispness. Clearly, even that favourite dish had lost all attraction for him. He pushed the plate from him with a groan. He rose. He paid his bill, and stalked out. He could bear the burden of deceit no longer. He must go home and confess all to his beloved Cecilia. The clocks were striking half-past eight when he reached his domestic doorstep. Pale and trembling at the prospect of the impending ordeal, he let himself in with his latch-key. He lingered in the lobby unnecessarily long over the task of taking off his overcoat, the while he was trying to brace himself up for his interview with Cecilia. Then, with the courage of desperation, he repaired to the drawing-room. Cecilia was not there. He tried the dining-room. She was not there either. She must be upstairs in her bedroom, then; and thither he went.

He tried the door. It was locked, but from within he heard the sound of his beloved's voice demanding, rather sharply:—

"Who's there?"

"It's I—Ted," he answered.

A sound of scuffling inside ensued, followed by the noise of an opening window. It was a minute or two before Cecilia unlocked the door. Her face was flushed. She looked excited, confused, even rather apprehensive. What could be the matter?

And then a smell—a strange, strong, penetrating smell—the unmistakable smell of frying or grilling—forced itself upon Bandon's olfactories.

He sniffed. He gazed around him with a puzzled air, Cecilia looking all the while, more and more confused. . . . The fire was burning in the grate, hot and clear—an ideal fire for grilling. Was it possible—could it be that . . .?

"Cecilia," he said, "there is a very marked smell of cooking in the room. Indeed, I could almost swear——"

Cecilia suddenly burst out crying.

"Oh, don't think too harshly of me, Ted," she sobbed, holding out her hands to him imploringly. "But I was so hungry; and while the servants were at supper, I—I—stole out to the butcher's and bought a mutton chop, and—and——"

But here Ted cut her short by seizing her in his arms and pressing her to him in a warm ecstatic embrace.

"I say, I am glad of this, Cis," he ejaculated, fervently.

"Glad?" she cried. "Oh, Ted; and you such a strict Churchman!"

"Not such a strict Churchman as you are a Churchwoman," he rejoined.

"I—I—ought to have told you, Ted. For some time now I have modified my views about fasting; only, knowing how strongly you felt upon the point, I was afraid to confess it to you for fear of forfeiting your respect and love, so——"

Ted Bandon burst into a roar of delighted laughter.

"Great Scot! What a funny game of blind man's buff we've been playing with each other," he said. "You humouring my supposed scruples with eternal salt fish and sago pudding, and I humouring yours by submitting to the beastly stuff; while all the time I've been dining at a restaurant on the sly, and you've been surreptitiously cooking chops in your bedroom. Well, we're quits now. That's one comfort. And I say, Cis!"

"What, Ted?"

"You won't give me any more salt fish or sago pudding just at present, will you, pet?"

"Never again, as I live, my own!"

And she didn't.

ART NOTES.

TO me at least one of the most terrifying events of the year is always the appearance of "The Year's Art." It is an excellent annual, quite a model of its kind; this year is no exception, but that only makes it the more terrible. I do not refer to the introductory essay on "The Past Year," by Mr. A. C. R. Carter, the editor. I read it, as always, with admiring interest; admiration which is none the less genuine because Mr. Carter describes me, unkindly if incidentally, as an angry, yelping jackal. He does not single me out personally, it is true, but employs the designation as a handy way of classifying those of us who did our little best to point out some of the disadvantages surrounding the purchase of Velasquez' "Venus" by the National Art Collection Fund for £45,000. I do not think that Mr. Carter ever quite understood the motives—they were quite honest, let me assure him—which impelled one at least of the jackals to give tongue. We did not object to the acquisition of the painting for the nation, if some one was generous enough to buy and present it. What made our crests bristle were the methods adopted in raising the funds for the purchase of a sufficiently good example of Velasquez—much of it, though, very obviously repainted, to say the least of it—at a preposterously inflated price. It still makes one jackal feel indignant when he remembers how very useful towards the purchase of other paintings for the nation the odd £25,000 or so—more, I mean, than the actual value of the painting at a very handsome valuation—would have been. As it was, owing to the very excellent methods of advertising adopted—the ingenious use of the "foreign purchaser" scare-lines, and so forth—that £25,000, instead of being left available for further additions to the National Art Collections, went into very estimable, but none the less, private pockets.

Even jackals are not without eyes and the faculty of appreciation, and I feel compelled to yelp forth, in passing, my admiration for the industry, and, still more, the carefulness, of Mr. Carter's labours. I have gone through the volume with my vulpine eyes open for blunders and omissions, and I have not found one. On the other hand, I have found pretty well everything that is to be said, formulated and tabulated about the Art of the past year. Which brings me to that part of the volume which I find so terrible. It is the "Directory of Artists and Art Workers," and it contains more than 8,000 names. And the list is professedly incomplete—including only the names of those who exhibited at some twenty-four representative exhibitions during the past year. Think of what it means! Think of the horrible, appalling significance of these 8,000 names! Take it that for each of the 8,000 who did exhibit at the twenty-four representative exhibitions there are only two who did not, a ridiculously low estimate—that there are, in fact, only 24,000 artists in the country. (Some few of them, I see, hail from Australia, but the moral is the same for all countries.) Then think of the number of people who buy pictures. Are there 24,000 of them—one apiece for the artists? Ask, rather, if there are 2,400—or 240! Think of that gallant little band of picture buyers, each of them, like a very Daniel, surrounded by his ten, or fifty, or a hundred artists—gazing at him with greedy eyes, holding out appealing hands towards him, looking towards him for the annual sustenance of their charming wives and their interesting children, many of whom, horresco referens, are going to be artists themselves some day. Of course, the artist may retort that there are quite as many superfluous journalists as artists. So there are. But, on the other hand, there are many more editors than there are picture buyers, and the demand for "copy" is, thank goodness, always on the increase. Though, even so, I should think that an editor with a conscience—if that be not a contradiction in terms—must pass many sleepless nights thinking of the perennial penury of his contributors and would-be contributors, and—but I am wandering from the subject.

One way of using up superfluous journalists would be for every one of the 24,000 artists to employ a capable press agent. I am sure it would pay them. There is a Russian gentleman named Borissoff, who is exhibiting a number of paintings of the Arctic regions at the Grafton Galleries, who is an excellent example of what I mean. He has a press agent, and one who knows his business thoroughly. M. Borissoff paints quite well, and he has hit upon a novel and interesting range of subjects. Some of his ice scenes almost make you turn your coat-collar up when you look at them. But where would they or their painter be without that indefatigable press agent? He has—or had a week ago—built up quite a Saga around M. Borissoff and his Arctic wanderings. It was impossible to open a daily paper without coming across thrilling accounts of the painter's struggles with Polar bears and walruses and Esquimaux and other wild fowl of one kind or another. Now, I am not quite sure why we should imagine that because a painter has carried on his work when his hands and eyes were frost-bitten, or while wrestling with a Polar bear at the bottom of a crevasse, it should be a nobler artistic effort than if he had completed it before a comfortable fire in the privacy of his own studio. But we certainly do so imagine; and M. Borissoff's press agent, smart man that he is, knows it, with the happy result that, if M. Borissoff had been Michael Angelo, and Raphael, and Rubens, and Velasquez all rolled into one, he could not have got his pictures more generally appreciated by the press.

Unfortunately, the vast majority of the 24,000 do not know how to pull the ropes in this masterly fashion, and have nobody to do it for them. They just paint their pictures and get them exhibited, and then pray. Or, if they are very enterprising and lucky, they know or get to know a man who knows a man whose brother once dined with a tame critic, and the man asks the other man to ask his brother to ask the host to ask the tame critic to give some sort of a notice to poor So-and-so, whom he believes, without accepting any responsibility in the matter, to be quite a decent sort of painter in his own little way. And the critic drops into the show, in the way of business, and because he is paid for it, and patronises it, kindly but firmly, in three lines, and pretends to the host that he is thereby conferring a great favour, and ought to be asked to dinner regularly once a week during their joint lives in consequence.

To choose at random one of the many minor picture shows which are open at the present time—at the Modern Gallery are a number of water-colours of garden scenes by Mrs. Caldwell Crofton. They are quite nice little paintings, not wildly exciting in themselves, but no less so than ninety-nine out of every hundred pictures that are exhibited nowadays. Now, if the artist had had a competent press agent, he would have warned her against painting gardens, which is not at all a perilous undertaking, except, perhaps, in the earwig season. He would have advised her to paint her pictures in the uttermost Sahara, preferably killing a lion by the way. If she had protested against this on humanitarian or other grounds he would have provided a stuffed lion for the purpose. And when she was going to open her exhibition of "Gardens in the Sahara," he would have sent round interesting biographical details of her adventures and her heroic struggles with beasts of prey. And if by some mistake on the part of enthusiastic interviewers or sub-editors, the one lion should have, as happened once before to the immortal Tartarin, grown into whole cohorts of lions by the time it reached the public, and it should be made clear that the heroic artist, having mislaid her brushes in the struggles, had cut off the hairy tips of half a dozen lions' tails and painted her pictures with them instead of brushes, then—well, I for one should probably have devoted the whole of this column to her exhibition, and every journalist with an eye to artistic effect would have done the same, according to his opportunities.

Lest it be held that I measure an artist's powers only by his capacity for self-advertisement, I would here draw attention to the fact that the Corporation of Manchester is about to hold an exhibition of the paintings of Frederic Shields during March and April, and are appealing to the owners of his works to lend them for that purpose. It is a worthy compliment to be paid to one whom I hold to be among the worthiest of our living painters, who is certainly our only living painter of religious pictures. I believe this, not only on technical grounds, nor because he ably supports a great tradition, but because his work is carried out in the right spirit. He seeks neither for self-glorification, nor for theatrical effect; he paints a religious subject reverently, sincerely, humbly, and it is evident in all his works. He paints for the glory of his God and his art. Pay a visit to the Chapel of the Ascension, in the Bayswater-road, where his fine series of decorative panels is now nearly completed, and judge for yourself; he does not trouble about réclames, but does his duty in the station of life to which it has pleased God to call him.

In consequence, you scarcely ever hear his name mentioned, even in artistic circles, and to the general public he is almost unknown. He is a son of whom Manchester may well be proud, and the Corporation in thus honouring him do themselves no less honour.

MUSIC.

THE SEAMY SIDE OF SCRATCH OPERA.

THE ending of the German opera season has been unfortunate for all concerned. Apart from the shocking loss of some of the members of the company in the appalling Berlin disaster, unpleasant reports are current as to the ability of the promoters of the undertaking to meet their financial obligations. At the moment of writing, it is not possible to state precisely how matters stand in this respect, since Messrs. Gundry and Straus, the auditors, are still engaged in the preparation of a statement of affairs. But quite enough is known to suggest decidedly unflattering reflections concerning the manner in which the undertaking has been managed. While it is understood that most, if not all, of the chorus and ballet received their salaries down to the date of the last performance, the same happy state of affairs certainly does not obtain as regards many of the principals and the members of the orchestra. The case of poor Frl. Schöne, one of the ill-fated Berlin victims, was particularly cruel, since I am told that, having failed to obtain leave of absence in the ordinary way, she was actually paying a fine of so much a day to the Mannheim opera authorities for the privilege of appearing at Covent Garden under what she doubtless regarded as highly favourable auspices. Alas! She had probably changed her opinion on this point before setting forth on that return journey which was to have for her so tragic an end. Nor can it be said that the absence of M. Van Dyck, immediately after the collapse of the concern of which he was the responsible manager, and while so many of his fellow artists would have been glad to see him personally, is an altogether agreeable feature of the affair.

Of course the salient feature of the situation is that the season has not been run by a single impresario making himself personally responsible to those who have entered into contract with him, but by a limited liability company. Such a body, as we all know, has neither a soul to be saved nor a body to be kicked, but this is not the end of the matter when it happens to be engaged in such a speculative business as the running of grand opera. An even greater point in its favour is that the individual obligations of its component members are strictly limited, with the result that when all its available funds are exhausted there is nothing more to be done so far as its creditors are concerned, and this would appear to be the position of affairs which obtains in the present instance. Whether the capital of £10,000 with which, it is understood, the company originally set out was adequate to its purposes, or whether the conduct of the enterprise was all that could have been desired, are other questions, which do not affect the issue on this particular point. At the same time, there is every reason to believe that Mr. Van Dyck's management was hardly the most economical imaginable, and if rumour is accurate as to the general run of the fees paid, it is not difficult to understand how the money went.

Not the least unfortunate part of an unfortunate business is the undesirable impression which it is likely to have produced abroad. It is the fact that the performances took place at Covent Garden which is likely to give rise to misapprehension. While it is well enough understood at home that Mr. Frank Rendle, the lessee of the opera-house, had merely sub-let the theatre to promoters of the venture, and that the Grand Opera Syndicate had no connection with the scheme whatever, it will hardly be surprising if these facts are not so clearly grasped on the Continent, and this being so, erroneous and unfortunate impressions may obtain currency. But on this, as on other aspects of the affair, it would be easy, of course, to exaggerate. After all, the eyes of Europe are not exactly concentrated on Covent Garden. Abroad, as at home, the speculative nature of most operatic undertakings is sufficiently well understood, and the circumstance that a scratch season such as that just ended has not quite run its full term will occasion probably a good deal less comment than some appear to think. But it would have been better, none the less, if it had not happened, and it is probable that for some little time to come Continental artists may be rather chary of accepting engagements in England unless they know with whom exactly they are dealing. Some even profess to think that the forthcoming German performances of the grand season may conceivably be affected, and that German music-lovers in London may mark their resentment of the treatment of their compatriots by staying away. But this would, of course, be absurd.

There have been a good many concerts lately, but none of very exceptional note. Pianists, again, have been much to the fore. Thus, on Saturday, Mr. Lamond, whose popularity steadily advances, played brilliantly as ever at the Bechstein Hall. On Thursday, Mr. Gottfried Galston rounded off his cycle of one-composer recitals with one devoted to Liszt. In the evening, Mr. Arthur Newstead, a clever young English artist, who has recently returned from a long tour abroad, was heard again, while another accomplished native player, in the person of Mr. Leonard Borwick, was heard at the Æolian Hall on Wednesday. Among several vocalists who have lately appeared, Dr. Lierhammer, who would make more effect if he suggested less of the pedagogue, was perhaps the most noteworthy. At the Chappell Ballad Concert on Saturday, a long and varied programme included a new song by Miss Maud White, "Under the Moon," which, if hardly the equal of some which that talented lady has given us in the past, proved yet sufficiently attractive, and Mr. W. H. Squire, who combines 'cello-playing with composition, was responsible for another new song entitled "The Siesta," which, as interpreted by Mr. Kennerley Rumford, made a great success. Mme. Edna Thornton, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Gregory Hast were some of the other well-known singers who appeared, and Herr Kreisler, who is becoming a rare favourite at the Ballads, was once more the violinist of the concert.

In the way of chamber music, which seems to have been recently looking up a little, several interesting works have been lately heard. César Franck's first pianoforte trio, which was brought forward at Miss Cécile Brani's concert on Tuesday week, proved, it is true, a sadly dull and laboured affair, but it was pleasant to have the opportunity of making acquaintance with it. On the same evening Miss Nora Clench and Mr. Joseph Holbrooke gave us Max Reger's forbidding yet in some respects strangely fascinating violin sonata in F sharp minor, while a pleasing piano quartet of Gabriel Fauré was brought forward at the Æolian Hall at Thursday's "twelve o'clock" concert by Miss Mathilde Verne, Mme. Beatrice Langley, Miss Cecilia Gates, and Miss May Mukle.

The German Opera season is over, and Covent Garden has closed its doors for the present, but London is by no means without opera, for all that. It is still to be had for those who seek it—in Shoreditch, where Mr. J. W. Turner and his company are once again drawing all the rank and fashion of that thriving quarter of the town to performances which, if applause counts for anything, would seem to leave nothing to be desired. Mr. Turner does not give his supporters the "Ring," "Tristan" or "Die Meistersinger." Their language would probably be illuminating if he did. But with such things as "Maritana" and "The Bohemian Girl" he affords unqualified delight to more unsophisticated hearers than those who slumber through "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," and in his modest way helps on the good cause which more learned musicians have at heart. It is stated, by the way, that Mr. Turner is about to retire from the management of the travelling company bearing his name, which has been in existence over twenty years. Mr. Turner himself made his operatic début as long ago as 1864, though he still sings as energetically as ever.

The promised presence of Dr. Grieg should impart exceptional interest to this year's Leeds Festival. The works which he will conduct have not yet been finally determined, but it is understood that his choral composition, "Olav Trygvason," will be one of them. The work was, if recollection serves, done at Queen's Hall a few years ago at one of the London Eistedfodd performances. Efforts were made, it appears, to secure a second "lion" in the person of Glazounow (whose eighth symphony is one of the instrumental compositions to be given), but without result in this case. Of the novelties promised, Stanford's "Stabat Mater," described as a "symphonic cantata," seems likely to prove the most important.

An appeal which, it is hoped, will meet with a ready response is being put forth on behalf of Mme. Georgina Burns, who some fifteen years ago enjoyed a distinguished reputation as an English prima donna, but who is now penniless, and has not a single relative in a position to support her. Mme. Burns lost all her savings in the Burns-Crotty Opera Company, which was a total financial failure, and has since been afflicted by prolonged ill-health. Mr. H. J. Wood and Mr. Ben Davies are among other well-known musicians interesting themselves in her sad case. Contributions may be sent to the Georgina Burns Fund, Church Army, 55, Bryanston-street, W.

The late Mr. Goldschmidt will be remembered, not only as the husband of Jenny Lind, but as the first conductor of the Bach Choir under whose direction many notable performances were given. He was, in fact, an admirable choral conductor, and the success of the Choir in its earlier days was largely due to his devoted labours. His own compositions were of small account, and with latter-day musical developments he was hopelessly out of sympathy, though this fact did not avail to lessen the respect in which he was held, alike as man and musician, by all who knew him. Mr. Goldschmidt survived his world-famous wife something less than twenty years.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—"How it struck a contemporary" is interesting, and even instructive, reading, when the contemporary had as keen an eye and bright a pen as "Malakoff" (1). "Malakoff" was the nom de guerre of the New York Times Paris correspondent, Dr. Johnston, during the entire existence from the cradle to the grave of the Second Empire. It is to the credit of "Malakoff's" discernment that he foresaw its grave from its cradle. Indeed, the wonder is that it should have lived so long, when one remembers that Napoleon III. had not even the claim of blood—not to say of brains—to the throne, since the French at least who endured him believed that he was no more the son of his supposed father than his half-brother, De Morny. However, as you might expect, Napoleon III. tried to make up by the pretentiousness of his Court for any lack of legitimacy. It is at once preposterous and pathetic to read now the regulations enforced on the Court at Eugénie's confinement of the Prince Imperial, and again upon the wet nurse of the baby. This nurse was forbidden to kiss the baby, to call him by a pet name, or to address to him baby language. When she was caught in the very act of kissing the baby by Mme. Bruat, the governess, there was a perfect storm in the palace. The Emperor was at last appealed to; but he was so much moved by the tearful entreaties of the nurse to be allowed at least to kiss her charge that he compromised matters thus: "Listen, nurse, to what I say, and calm yourself. I am going to offer you a compromise. You can kiss your child as much as you wish, but you must not give him names unworthy of his rank." You remember Dr. Johnson's similar interdict and its result? Pitying a poor woman with a baby, who was trudging along the road through the mud of a wet day, he gave her a seat in his coach on the condition that she did not talk baby language to the child. Hardly, however, was she seated in the coach when she burst out irrepressibly "An' did the little Georgey-porgy like its jaunt in a coachy-poachy?" with the result of her instant expulsion by the exasperated doctor. I fancy the Imperial nurse must have broken out, at least in the night watches, with profane prattle. To the philosopher the real hero of these two volumes is not one of those of the many wars it chronicles—Crimean, Franco-Austrian, Franco-Prussian, and that between the North and South in America—but Béranger, who scorned at once popularity, riches, places, and honours. He refused the Legion of Honour, a place in the French Academy, a place in the Cabinet, the Ministry of Public Instruction, the direction of the National Printing Office, the direction of the Mont-de-Piété, a seat in the National Assembly, and the offers made many times to him of pensions to save him from the destitution in which he died. The poet shrank so from the public notice which haunted him that to escape it he removed to Passy. But Passy was so moved by the honour of his residence that its mayor and municipal council proceeded to his humble house in state to make him the presentation—of the finest place in its cemetery! Even this honour he declined, and he was finally huddled into his grave hurriedly and stealthily, as though his corpse was plague-stricken, by the Imperial Government, through its dread of a popular demonstration at his funeral. Whether Béranger would have sung with such fervour the glories of the First Empire if he had seen the sights that appalled "Malakoff" after the battle of Solferino, is doubtful. Upon a false alarm being raised that the beaten Austrians had broken through the French lines and were slaughtering all before them, the drivers of the ambulance waggons, in their mad haste to escape, flung the wounded on to the road, where they were crushed to death or left to die. Next to the horrors of war, the heroisms of the French soldiery seemed to have made most impression upon "Malakoff." Not the mad heroism merely of hot blood in the battle, but the patient fortitude of these soldiers who died like beasts of burden from all the horrors of hunger, thirst, heat, and hard work. Indeed, "Malakoff" found to be essentially French those Spartan virtues of silent endurance of suffering and silent acceptance of victory which we consider distinctively British. He contrasts thus the frantic excitement in London upon the receipt of the news of a victory, with the stolid calm of the Parisians under the same circumstances:—

> The different manner in which the news of the victory of the Alma has been received in Paris and in London is worth noting. If we are to credit the English newspapers, the staid, sober, impassive Englishman grew noisy and frantic with expansive delight. Even the brokers on 'Change broke out in song—though, to be sure, "God Save the Queen" is not a lively air. . . . In Paris the outside of some of the theatres and four windows in the Rue de la Paix were illuminated. I caught in Paris passing words that showed that the news of victory was a topic of conversation. And these are the sum of public demonstration on the occasion of a national victory by the most emotional, sensitive, volatile, frisky people in the world! Curious, is it not?

Again, he contrasts the receipt of the news of the victory of Solferino in Paris—"announced in six lines in the Paris papers without one word of fanfaronade"—with the extravagant descriptions in the American papers of the bombardment of Fort Sumpter—"for fifty miles around the scene was one of indescribable grandeur." At Solferino fifty thousand men bit the dust; during the bombardment of Fort Sumpter not a single life was lost on either side. Who would have said a priori that "Mafficking" was much more an English or an American frenzy than a French? The heroine of "The Whirlwind" (2) either sells or gives her body, I really am not sure which, to her husband's master, while loving her husband idolatrously, and while being the simplest, straightest, purest, and sweetest of women. Nor is this impossible inconsistency lightened by the contrast between the physical and mental manliness of her husband and pettiness of her lover. The truth is that such a woman as Sarah Jane Friend could not have been unfaithful to such a husband as Daniel Brandon with any one, and, least of all, with a creature like Hilary Woodrow. Yet more incredible is the suggestion made in some passages of the story that the heroine deliberately sold her body to her lover to secure to her husband promotion on the farm. But Mr. Eden Phillpotts must wind up his story with his usual melodramatic catastrophe, and to this end are sacrificed the heroine's character and the reader's sympathy. But the pity of it! For all the earlier scenes and characters of the story are nature itself as Mr. Eden Phillpotts knows it so well in his beloved Dartmoor. A greater contrast to the natural country folk of "The Whirlwind" than the fashionable fribbles of "The Expensive Miss Du Cane" (3) cannot well be imagined. But these creatures are natural, too, of their kind—not an engaging kind, certainly, for the hero is a snob and a cad, while the heroine, whom he virtually jilts, is not romantically harrowed by her disillusionment and disappointment. The dreariness of the close of the story and of her romance is, however, poignantly conveyed, and Mr. Macnaughtan has succeeded in giving a faithful, if somewhat cynical, view of a country-house party. In his "Harry and Ursula" (4), Mr. Norris has been unusually happy in giving both sides of the indispensable lovers' misunderstandings from the point of view of each as expressed in his and her reminiscences. Indeed, nothing could be more natural than these misunderstandings, for, as you know, Mr. Norris has long been thoroughly at home in lovers' quarrels, while the happy ending of the novel is a welcome relief after the stormy catastrophe of "The Whirlwind," and the dismal close of "The Expensive Miss Du Cane." In a word, Mr. Norris is at his best in "Harry and Ursula." Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's misogynist novel, "Adam's Clay" (5) is unusually clever and has at least one absolutely original situation. A husband just returned from sea interrupts his lovely young wife's lover in the act of strangling her, but almost apologises for the interruption. "Well," he said, "are you goin' to kill that dirty little woman, or isn't it worth your while?" This situation is skilfully led up to, though a hypercritical reader might object that so clever a coquette as "the beautiful Betty Blundell" would never have written to a rival such compromising confidences.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

The "Notes from Paris" in last week's Truth contained some interesting personal and literary references to the Marquis de Ségur, one of the newly elected members of the French Academy. By a happy coincidence, Messrs. Chatto and Windus have just published the authorised English version (price 7s. 6d. net) of his latest book, "Julie de Lespinasse." It is a fascinating biographical study of that famous Frenchwoman, embodying much fresh material, and is generally regarded as the best book that M. de Ségur has written.

The new book from the pen of Mr. A. C. Benson which Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. will have ready on March 12 is entitled "Beside Still Waters." It is a story in which the interest is mainly psychological, the evolution of a mystical type of character being traced on the religious and artistic as well as on the ethical side. On the same date, Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. will publish "The Letters of One," by Charles Hare Plunkett. This book also presents a psychological study, the writer of the letters being depicted as a man of sensitive and irresolute character who has to choose, or imagines that he has to choose, between a marriage promising him happiness and security and the service of art. The author gives a relentless analysis of the artistic temperament.

Mr. Murray is publishing this week "George Crabbe and His Times," a translation by Mr. Frederick Clarke of a volume by M. René Huchon, Lecturer in English at the Faculty of Letters in the University of Nancy. M. Huchon has made a close study of the life and writings of George Crabbe, and his work is not merely a biography of the English poet, but a careful account of his surroundings, social, political, and historical.

"Lady Nugent's Journal: Jamaica one Hundred Years Ago" has been published by Messrs. A. and C. Black (price 5s. net) for the Institute of Jamaica, whose secretary, Mr. Frank Cundall, has edited the volume. The journal, which presents an interesting picture of life in the colony at the beginning of the nineteenth century, was written by Lady Nugent during the period of her husband's governorship, and was printed for private circulation only in 1839. The present edition has twelve illustrations and two maps.

There has been so great a demand in advance for Sir Oliver Lodge's book, "The Substance of Faith Allied with Science: A Catechism for Parents and Teachers" that a large second edition is already in the press. The publishers are Messrs. Methuen and Co.

Mr. John Lane is publishing this week "Women of the Second Empire: Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III.," a translation of a book by Frederic Loliee. Mr. Richard Whiteing contributes an introduction. A feature of the volume is the illustrations, which include over fifty portraits of the beauties of the Court.

Next month Mr. Douglas Sladen's new book, "The Secrets of the Vatican" will be issued by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett. It will be embellished with sixty illustrations, partly from photographs of the unshown portions of the Vatican and partly from the superb engravings of Pistolesi.

For the foundation of the plan of his forthcoming book, "Russia and Reform," announced by Messrs. Constable, Mr. Bernard Pares takes the view that the political difficulties in Russia are the result of a great moral conflict between the teachings of two schools—the Slaphophiles and Westernism. He sketches the chief features of Russia's development as a people and as a State, explains the significance of the points at issue between the Government and the people, and brings the story of the present movement up to the election of the second Duma.

In Mr. Philip L. Stevenson's "A Gallant of Gascony," which Messrs. Hurst and Blackett will shortly publish, the romantic life of Marguerite de Valois is dealt with for the first time in a novel. The scene is laid in Paris, Gascony, and the Auvergne, and the book is full of exciting incidents. Mr. Stevenson is known to many readers as the author of "A Gendarme of the King" and "The Black Cuirassier."

With the expiration of the copyright of the early editions of a number of Ruskin's books, cheap reprints are beginning to appear. Messrs. Routledge have just commenced the publication of a series called "The Universal Ruskin," in which they have now issued "Modern Painters" (five volumes, with 314 illustrations), "The Stones of Venice" (three volumes, with 166 illustrations), "Lectures on Architecture," "Unto this Last," "The Two Paths," and other works. The price of these volumes, which are well got-up, is one shilling each.

"The Poems of Emily Brontë," with an introduction by Mr. Arthur Symons, and "Selected Essays of Joseph Addison," with an introduction by Mr. Austin Dobson, are two new volumes of the Favourite Classics, Mr. Heinemann's remarkably cheap series of reprints.

Mr. Henry Frowde continues to make many acceptable additions to the well-known series of "The World's Classics," among the recent volumes (one shilling each) being "Poems of Thomas Hood," "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures," "Cranford," and "The Pickwick Papers."

More cheap classics! Messrs. Sisley will begin early in March the publication of a new series of shilling reprints, to be called the "Sisley Books." Among the first twenty volumes, which are to be issued simultaneously, will be "The Idylls of the King," Rousseau's "Confessions," "Wuthering Heights," "Salammbo," and "Sheridan's Plays."

In Messrs. Blackwood's popular edition of George Eliot's novels, "Felix Holt" and "Middlemarch" (3s. 6d. each volume) have just been published.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—Last Friday's Court, the first of the year, was a very large one. The Queen wore black lace embroidered with sequins. The Duchess of Buccleuch had dazzling jewels, and both she and her sister, Lady Lansdowne, wore many Orders. Lady Tweeddale's grey and gold gown and train were as artistic as beautiful, and her splendid emeralds made a very lovely contrast. Lady Salisbury's cloth of gold, with sparkling bugles and rare old Italian point, was another admirable gown. Lady Dysart also wore cloth of gold embroidered in silver. Olivia Lady Cairns, presenting her daughter, looked extremely well in pale pink satin muslin, and carried a glorious Goodyear bouquet of shaded pink carnations. Lady Rosemary Cairns, in white net embroidered with silver, had a bolero of silver embroidery fringed with silver. The white chiffon train looked as though made by fairies, so fresh and dainty were the folds. An arcade bouquet of lily of the valley arranged as a mere handful added to the simple girlish effect.

Yellow is coming up again this season. Lady Fitzgerald, wife of the Knight of Kerry (I always think his such a romantic title!), wore tea-rose yellow satin, the bodice made Empire-shape and trimmed with chains of brilliants. The cloth-of-gold train was veiled with pale yellow tulle, and had a long spray of Gloire de Dijon roses down one side. She presented her only daughter, who is god-daughter of the Duchess of Connaught, and who wore white chiffon strewn with diamond dewdrops, and a glorious train of Mechlin lined with chiffon.

Mrs. W. W. Astor was much observed in her lovely gown, made Empire style in Brussels net deeply flounced with fine old Brussels point, bordered with a band of ermine. Folds of pale blue velvet, arranged most becomingly, brought the bodice into harmony with the pale blue velvet train.

By the way, I hear that many ladies consider that it is a defect in the arrangements for the Courts (otherwise excellent) that their invitations fail to indicate for which particular date they are intended. Surely it would be a simple matter to make out the cards for a definite Court.

The poets all along the ages have said that spring shows herself first in some "timid snowdrop" in a "quiet nook." I think this is a mistake; I always see her first in a hat-shop window, wherein felt and fur give place to flowers and feathers; and if the feathers do not flutter there, at least the flowers do not fade, however cold the wind. Flower toques are still to the fore; they greet the spring regularly every year. In shaded hyacinths and roses and violets they are charming, and they are made in various round and torpedo shapes. A very pretty one in white lilac has a bunch of pink roses at one side. The torpedo shapes are still to be worn, but the newest of the new hats is a very small mushroom shape, tilted up on an all-round bandeau, and with a brim coming low at the back. We were studying several of these at the Parisian Hat Company last week. (By the way, it is only the number in Bond-street that matches the price—thirty shillings; the Knightsbridge address is not so accommodating, and the new branch is not 30, but 7, High-street, Kensington.) The prettiest were in roughly plaited straw. One was in cream chip, the bandeau hidden under ruffled brown tulle, and the crown loosely swathed with green and brown tulle. Green and brown ostrich feathers drooped in a cluster over the brim at one side. Even smaller, but of the same shape, was a mushroom in opalescent straw of green and mauve shades, trimmed with a wreath of all sorts of little babyish blossoms—forget-me-nots, roses, "cherry-pie," London pride, jessamine, all brought into tints of mauve and faint pink, with a background of dull green foliage. A long feather, white in the centre, with the tips of the fronds shaded to dark green and mauve, hung over the brim at one side, and curled round on the hair at the back.

A very pretty hat, in a peculiarly rakish and charming version of the tricorne, was in dull Persian lilac tulle, covered with shaded hyacinths in pale pinkish and darker tints. A bright pink rose at one side was enough trimming. Another flower-hat, in powder-blue straw, had blue hyacinths round the brim, and a huge knot of looped blue glacé ribbon at one side. Very smart was a toque folded into torpedo-shape of moleskin coloured straw. This was drawn into two rows of medallions round the brim, with green straw centres resembling roses, while at one side an osprey of moleskin and green barley rose above a cluster of bright red cherries. Loops of narrow green velvet ribbon rested on the hair at the back. A quiet brown torpedo hat was covered with a veil of coffee-and-milk chiffon, floating out at the back. Two flat fawn and white wings lay on the crown, held by a fawn-coloured buckle in front. This was very smart, but unostentatious; the sort of hat to be worn shopping, but if you meet Mary she's sure to carry you off to Prince's to luncheon. Do you know that sort of chance? It is so difficult to find a hat which is equal to an unexpected invitation. A version of the Tyrolese shape, in green straw, with brown wings, tilted on an all-round bandeau of brown tulle, is also one of these rare hats.

Finally, there was a perfect dream, a thirty-shilling marvel, of very fine straw, in a gipsy shape, in a pinky-tan shade, with deeper tan velvet round the crown, and a riot of large pink roses at the back, tumbling over the brim in one place; and a ruche of soft brown tulle on the hair at the back. Now which of them all would you choose, from my inadequate description?

Have you ever experienced the unpleasantness of conversing with anyone whose eyes wobble about, apparently unable to focus themselves on any one point? Or have you ever seen anyone whose eyes seem to lean up against their glasses? Things run curiously in layers, and in one morning last week I underwent both of these disagreeable experiences. And both varieties are probably easily curable. I think I told you about Mary's elder boy, whose prospects in life are seriously damaged by the carelessness of his parents in not having his sight examined when he was small, and taking measures to improve it. When he was a tiny child he always longed to be a soldier, and the wish did not pass as it often does. Think, then, of his bitter disappointment when he found he could not pass for the Army owing to defective sight. The doctor said the words "gross neglect" and "unpardonable carelessness." You could not help pitying poor Mary, blamable as she is, for when she heard the bad news she nearly cried her own eyes out. She took Noll to Dollond's, in Cheapside, a firm with a reputation dating back one hundred and fifty years, and with probably the widest experience in sight-testing in the world. Here again her heart was pierced by an observation made: "Had the young gentleman been provided with suitable glasses ten years ago, his defect of vision could have been completely cured."

"Is it too late now?" asked Noll. "No," he was told.

Important to Ladies. — You can get the real genuine Horrockses' Longcloths and Flannelettes if you insist on seeing this stamp on the selvedge: 'Horrockses.' Obtainable from the principal Drapers. Over a century's reputation.

"It is an irregularity in the curvature of the cornea, and can be corrected by wearing proper glasses."

I went to Dollond's years ago with father, who had been troubled with his eyes, and shall never forget the pater's delight when he began wearing his glasses. Not only did his new vision of things add to the joy of life, but the headache he had suffered so much from disappeared completely, his digestion improved, and he could take longer walks and do an increased amount of work. Ada, too, always says that Dollond's Featherweight eyeglasses have "made over" the world for her, to use an American expression. She used to wear pince-nez that justified their title by pinching her nose, making ugly marks on it, and by pressing on some blood vessel giving her headache. But the Featherweight clip has no high-arched bridge, and yet, by means of a cleverly devised spring, rests on the nose with perfect security, even in windiest weather. It is rimless, therefore lighter and less expensive than the old-fashioned eyeglasses, and, what is more, practically invisible, needing neither chain nor guard of any kind. In fact, it marks a new era for those who have to wear glasses.

The reason the pater went to Dollond's in the first instance was that all their work is done in England by Englishmen. You know the dear old man's patriotic feeling about such things. Would there were more like him!

Ella has been experimenting with home-made bread, and is inflated with pride over her success. She got hold of a little booklet issued from Horseferry-road by the Gas Light and Coke Company, containing full instructions about both making and baking bread at home. Her loaves look and taste delicious, and she declares that cook thinks it no trouble to bake them in the gas oven. One advantage is that the bread is free from adulteration. We very particularly fell in love with her brown loaves—such pictures—and are going to try bread-making ourselves.

Richard is extremely pleased with himself for having "discovered," as he phrases it, the large stone bottles of Apollinaris water, and converses with some eloquence on the "what a good boy am I!" theme. He deserves some commendation, for the stone bottles are a great improvement in every way on the ordinary glass bottles. The earthenware keeps the water cool and sparkling during the longest dinner in a hot room, and by using an inexpensive patent cork any water left in the bottle can be drawn off later in as bright condition as that from a freshly opened bottle. You know how deliciously cool ordinary water always is when kept in those terra-cotta jars? Well, in the same way the "Polly" is preserved from becoming tepid by the stone jars, which, by the way, are ornamental in shape and colour. And with these advantages there is the additional one (which appeals to most people nowadays) of economy, as the stone jars, both large and small, are a trifle cheaper than the glass ones. I expect you to thank me for imparting Richard's valuable "discovery." What would the world do without Apollinaris, the acknowledged queen of table waters? And especially those who like champagne, and could not dare to take it without the precautionary measure of sipping a little of this unique water during dinner. They may then take their champagne without fear of any ill effects. And is there any wine quite so nice as good, dry champagne? Perhaps sparkling Burgundy—but no! Delicious as it is, it fails to be appropriate to such varied occasions as champagne.

You remember the very pretty necklets and chains made by "Marguerite," of Bombay. You admired them because they are so uncommon and artistic. She now makes, in addition to the above, the most perfect amulet necklets, the prettiest we have ever seen, with all the lucky stones of the months introduced in a very graceful and highly becoming way. The idea is that good fortune is secured by wearing the sacred stones consecrated by the Chaldeans to the twelve signs of the Zodiac, so that as each constellation rises above the horizon the corresponding jewel is there ready to secure for the possessor the benign influence it is supposed to bestow. The price of this lovely amulet necklace, which "goes" with any colour, having so many in itself, is 2½ guineas; and if any one prefers one in any single stone, such as turquoise, sapphire, topaz, amethyst, or pearl, these would be the same price. Opal or ruby are more expensive, costing 3 guineas. Any one born in October should choose the opal. July is the month of the ruby, but I am sure you have the complete list somewhere. Marguerite can send any of these pretty necklets or long chains in jade, turquoise, etc., by return of post, when a postal order accompanies the letter. The amulet necklace with all the twelve stones would charm your Brenda. You could get one in time for her birthday by writing at once: Marguerite, P. and O. Dockyard, Mazagon, Bombay, is the full address.

On the last three days of next week the Royal Amateur Art Society will hold its annual exhibition at Hyde Park House, Knightsbridge, lent for the occasion by Lady Naylor Leyland. Princess Alexander of Teck will open the exhibition on the Thursday and will also distribute the prizes. Dr. Emil Reich will give an address on art. On Friday Princess Louise Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein will open the show and Mr. Henry Cunynghame will give an address on "Enamel Work"; while on Saturday Lady Henry Somerset will speak on "Art in its Relation to Charity." The proceeds of the exhibition will be devoted to the Parochial Mission Women Fund, the East London Nursing Society, and the Church Army.

I have received the following from Mona:—

My Dear Madge,—We are now entering upon our busy season, for the time of seed-sowing has begun. David is preparing the boxes of soil, Brada is sowing the seeds, and I am noting down any important particulars. We use boxes in preference to pans, because they are lighter and cheaper, and in preference to pots because they hold more soil, which is, therefore, less likely to get dry. For delicate seeds which usually lie a long time in the ground before germinating, the soil is first sterilised by baking, but for ordinary seeds it is merely sifted, the coarser portion being put at the bottom of each box, and the finer at the top. As I have just suggested, the periods which elapse between sowing and germination differ widely. In some cases a few days are sufficient; in others, as much as a year may be required. I mentioned last week that the seeds of cannas often took months to germinate unless they were manipulated by filing and soaking in hot water. The seeds of some Alpine plants, such as auriculas, are very slow and irregular. If, instead of being sown as soon as they are ripe, they are kept until the following spring—which is the general practice—the seedlings will often continue to appear in twos and threes for a whole year, or longer, if you have the patience to leave the box of soil undisturbed and keep it watered. There is an obvious reason for this acquired habit. Slowness of germination prevents the seedlings, when growing in their native country, from appearing before the severe Alpine winter is over, and irregularity ensures the perpetuation of the race in case the earliest batches are destroyed by late frosts. But why, you may ask, is the irregularity carried over a whole year? That, I think, is due to our unnatural method of storing these seeds. We are most careful to protect them from frost; yet in a wild state they are bound to be frozen in winter. It has been found that the seeds of certain North American plants will not germinate unless they have first been frozen, and if the same treatment were applied to the seeds of Alpine plants, which are accustomed to very similar conditions, I feel convinced that their germination would be quicker and more regular than it is at present. Anyway, I intend to try.

There is one Alpine which it is almost impossible to raise from seed—the lovely blue gentian (G. acaulis). Bought seed, or seed which has been kept for any length of time, is practically useless; seed which you have saved yourself and sown at once is better, but even then you may have to wait two or three years before the seedlings appear, or before you can be quite certain that they are never going to appear. That, I know, would be too great a trial for your patience. Gardening is full of such trials. I remember an enthusiastic gardener telling me how he had sat up all night to watch the opening of the flower of an orchid raised from seed which he had sown eleven years before, and how excited he was when he saw that the time was approaching. It was not his orchid, but his employer's, yet he felt like the holder of a lottery ticket which may draw a big prize or a blank. That was a long wait, yet for gentians it is not much shorter. They are generally propagated by division of the roots, and even then may not flower for a year or two, for they greatly dislike disturbance. It is a pity, for there is not a more beautiful blue in the garden. One of the plants which most nearly approaches it is the Dropmore variety of Anchusa italica. I mentioned it last spring in my description of the Temple show, where it was quite a feature. The flowers of the well-known old A. italica are a dull purplish blue, but in the new variety they are a rich blue, not unlike that of the gentians. The plants grow four or five feet high, and, though perennials, will flower this year if the seed is sown at once under glass. I consider them much the best of the year's novelties.

Of course, if we are to judge from the catalogues, all novelties are exquisite, and nearly all other plants as well. I confess that these seedmen's catalogues have as great a fascination for me as, if you will not mind my saying so, the dress-shops have for you. The illustrations of plants simply covered with beautiful flowers almost make me forget that my business is to sell, and strongly tempt me to buy the lot. If only they illustrated plants which I did not know, the illusion would be complete and enduring. But they make the mistake of depicting also what is familiar, and recognition—often impossible but for the letterpress—brings disillusionment. I am looking now at an illustration of the new Nicotiana hybrids. I recognise it as a French cliché, but the plants themselves I should hardly recognise, they are so idealised. Still, they are worth growing, either in beds by themselves or in the mixed border. There was, you may remember, a good deal of excitement two or three years ago about the first of these hybrids, Nicotiana sanderæ, with red flowers instead of the white of the ordinary sweet-scented tobacco-plant. Everybody rushed to grow it, and then came complaints that the red was a dull, slightly purplish colour, and already it is out of favour. But these new hybrids are a very great improvement. They are not confined to a single colour, but range from pale yellow to dark red, and though in every batch of seedlings there must necessarily be some which are unsatisfactory, I think that on the whole you would be delighted with these plants. Here, too, the seed should be sown under glass. There is no actual hurry—any time in March will do.

You know salpiglossis, of course, with its tubular flowers of various colours exquisitely lined and marked with bronze. The one objection to it is its straggling habit of growth. In a comparatively new variety, Emperor, this has been overcome. Instead of having a number of shoots from the base, it grows erect with a single stem. Get a packet of seed and try it. It is a half-hardy annual, and should be treated as such.—Your affectionate cousin, MONA.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—If the country is happy which has no history, the antithesis, no doubt, holds good that the country is unhappy which has history, and still more the one which not only has too much, but sometimes even little else, at frequent intervals, spasmodically and acutely. For all that, I do not know that we are unhappy, though it is certain that the country which possesses a perennial "Question" is always in the state of having history. To begin with, we are born to our "Question," it is the heritage of ages; we are entangled from our birth, without any choice in the matter, in its knots and intricacies. It always is and always has been with us, like the poor; we would not know ourselves without it. On the whole, too, we are a cheerful race, with a gift of adapting ourselves to circumstances and looking for mitigations in them. Our attitude towards Dublin Castle is an example of this; it represents the Government of Ireland which everyone, more or less, seems to think a bad one, though not so bad as in the days when Grattan said: "To find a worse Government than the Government of the English in Ireland, you must go to hell for your policy and to Bedlam for your discretion." Whatever Dublin Castle is, however, there it is in our midst, and there we are cheerfully making the best of it. How hard it would be on our sex, who are not yet politically articulate over here, if we might not enjoy the social amenities of the Viceregal Court. Fortunately, we are not the least inclined to be hard on ourselves, but wisely take our good where we find it.

The season resumed its normal course last week, to be interrupted at the end by Lord and Lady Aberdeen's visit to London, where they went for the presentation of Lady Haddo at the Court at Buckingham Palace on Friday night. Our Viceregal rulers, unlike our Royal ones, always seem to make very light of the journey between the big and little capitals. The weather was not at all helpful to this mental attitude last week; not only did the wild winds disturb the waters of the Irish Sea, they even interfered with the iron way on land. The Irish mails by sea and land had very bad experiences of the weather on several days. The second Levee and Drawing Room were held on the same day, which was an innovation. Neither ceremonial was crowded. The Drawing Room, or rather Court, was again held in St. Patrick's Hall. It was small enough to have ample space for everyone. Never was a better opportunity afforded for displaying Court costumes, and many beautiful ones profited by it. We are not accustomed to the idea of the Vicerey remaining seated whilst our sex file by and make curtsies to him. The effect is unchivalrous; there is the suggestion of the ways of Oriental potentates about it. However, the King can do no wrong; we have to accept a decline in manners at Court and grumble at it. Lady Aberdeen was resplendent in a sapphire satin dress with shiny trimmings, and a sapphire chiffon velvet train with lovely Irish point lace. Her jewels were very fine. Lady Arran was in white, with silver, pearl, and shining embroidery; her collar of pearls and diamonds, and her tiara of brilliants were lovely. Lady Bandon wore faint grey, and Lady Haddo pale blue. Lady Blanche Seymour in white satin, with a black velvet train, chaperoned her sisters, Lady Hersey and Lady Edina Conyngham, the latter of whom was presented. Lady Massereene and Ferrard and her sister, Miss Ainsworth, were also amongst the presentations, Lady Massereene's tall figure looking extremely effective in a handsome Court dress with many diamonds. Lady M'Calmont's beautiful costume was of white satin, embroidered with silver and crushed pearls, and her train of pink chiffon and lace. Lady Carbery wore white satin with a train of white puffed chiffon. Lady MacDonnell was in grey with handsome lace, and Miss MacDonnell in pale green with a lace train. Lady Clonbrock presented her daughter, Lady Mahon. Amongst others present were Ladies Castletown, Musgrave, Chamberlain, Ross of Bladensburg, Arnott, the Misses Alice and Margaret Glyn, Ethel Dillon and O'Brien. Many diaphanous trains were worn. The fashion is somewhat theatrical in suggestion, and, with diamond stars in the hair, looks as if the costume should be completed by a fairy wand, instead of a bouquet, in the hand.

The State Ball on the next night was a big one, the guests numbering over a thousand. Dancing was in both the St. Patrick's Hall and Throne Room. The military were in full dress and the civilians in Court dress, which, with the present somewhat fantastic fashion of women's attire, made the entertainment look rather like a fancy ball and very picturesque. There were quite a number of pretty and attractive girls—Lady Violet Brabazon, the Ladies Conyngham, the Misses Glyn, Miss I. FitzGerald, and many others. Most striking looking amongst the young matrons was Lady Massareene in a glittering princess or Empire dress, with a fine tiara of diamonds, and Lady Blanche Seymour, very pretty in a black dress. Lady Hawkesbury had a peculiar brown costume. Lady Musgrave's handsome dress was of white striped satin muslin with embroidery, Lady Weldon's of black velvet, Lady Margaret Forbes wore rose colour chiffon, Lady Ross of Bladensburg a costume of white chiné silk, and Lady M'Calmont blue, with fine diamonds. Sir Hugh M'Calmont, who came to Dublin for the Levee, has, with Lady M'Calmont, been staying at the residence of his mother, Mrs. Barton, in Merrion Square. Mrs. Barton, in her time, kept up the tradition of Irish beauty, as did her daughter, Lady Brooke, in the next generation. Mrs. Barton is still a handsome lady of much personal charm and Celtic vivacity. General Sir William Butler also came to Dublin for the Levee, and joined Lady Butler and his daughter, who are spending the season here.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I am so glad you liked the recipes. Here are some more. These lemon dumplings are worth some attention:—

Grate half a pound of bread into fine crumbs, add to them a quarter of a pound of fine beef suet, chopped fine, a quarter of a pound of Demerara sugar, the juice and zest of a large lemon; mix all well together with a glass of wine, boil them in small cup moulds for about three-quarters of an hour. Turn them out on a dish and screen them with red currant liquor or jelly.

These oyster patties are really too nice to be appropriated to Lent:—

Line some small patty pans with some good puff paste, put a round piece of bread into each, put on the lids, and bake them in a quick oven. Have ready this mixture: Beard a dozen oysters, cut each one into two, put them in a saucepan with the liquor from the oysters, carefully strained, season it with grated nutmeg, pepper, salt, and grated lemon peel; simmer for three minutes, then stir in enough cream to thicken it. Do not let it boil. Remove the lids of the patties, and having taken out the bread, fill them with oyster mixture; put on the lids again and send to table on a dish covered with a d'oyley. Garnish them with parsley.

Finally, try these oysters in scallops' shells:—

Allow half a dozen oysters to each shell. Let them remain in their own liquor. Put into a saucepan an ounce of butter, three skinned mushrooms, a bunch of parsley, and three skinned shallots, finely minced, and a dash of nutmeg. Dust in a little flour. Stir this over the fire until it is brown, then add the liquor from the oysters. When it is of the consistency of thick sauce remove it from the fire and put in the oysters, and give it a toss or two, adding the juice of a lemon and a dash of cayenne. Put the mixture into the shells, which have been well buttered. Screen them with fine bread crumbs, place small pieces of butter here and there. Now put the shells upon a tin and set it in a good oven. When the scallops are of a fine colour send them to table in the shells. Arrange them on a dish upon a d'oyley. Garnish them with parsley.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

INDISCREET LETTERS FROM PEKING.
Edited by B. L. PUTNAM WEALE,
Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," &c., &c.
1 vol., demy 8vo, price 7s. 6d. net.

"These remarkably 'indiscreet' letters are more exciting than ninety-nine novels out of a hundred. They contain the full story of the siege and sack of the city in all its horrible nakedness, without regard for the feelings of anybody connected with the campaign."—Daily Graphic.

"The writer roughly drags aside the veil which a discreet diplomacy had drawn over the truth, and gives us . . . a book remarkable alike for its sincerity, its dramatic power, and its dazing indiscretion. The lurid account here given of the sack of Peking by the allied armies is an appalling revelation of the demoralisation into which the troops fell."—Morning Post.

"A book eminently readable, absolutely true, and amazingly indiscreet. . . . Of enthralling interest. . . . It lives, and it is true. . . . On every page is a picture worthy of exhibition. . . . A book to read and not to skim."—The Tribune.

THE WORLD OF CRIME.
By M. GORON,
Late Chief of the Paris Detective Police.
Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

HURST & BLACKETT, Ltd., 182, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

The TRIBUNE:—"Its studies of character are marked by rare insight—full of subtle wit and humour."

WORLD:—"A story of Irish people that is neither prejudiced nor patronising. . . . This rare and charming novel."

The SPECTATOR:—"A deeply interesting study of Irish character and politics."

Her Majesty's Rebels. By S. R. LYSAGHT. 6s.

The ACADEMY:—"It is seldom that we are given a picture of the Ireland of the early eighties half so finished, so true, or so just as Mr. Lysaght's. He handles his men and women with the quiet sympathy of one who knows and understands them. To him they are living men and women, and he makes them live for us."

MACMILLAN and CO., Ltd., London.

A Book You Must Not Miss.

PASSION'S PERIL.
By STUART YOUNG. 6s.

PASSION'S PERIL.
GREENING & CO., LTD.

The MORNING POST says:—"It is clever and often beautiful, and it strikes one as sincere. It rakes in the ashes of the near past and tells the story of Selwyn Waring, poseur and dramatist, who found his soul in Wandsworth Gaol and died of consumption in Paris. The ashes glow as Mr. Young breathes on them, and we feel that if the story must be re-told it has found the right teller."

"Mr. Marriott Watson in his gayest and most irresponsible mood."—MORNING POST.

HARRY AND URSULA.

By W. E. NORRIS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An exceedingly interesting story, very brightly told."—BIRMINGHAM POST.
"He has got hold of a theme which gives plenty of play to his peculiarly delicate appreciation of the finer things of life."—STANDARD.
"It has humanity and genuine pathos."—DAILY MAIL.
"Invested with a quiet charm and convincing atmosphere."—COURT JOURNAL.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

A BLIND BIRD'S NEST.

By MARY FINDLATER, Author of "The Rose of Joy." With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Is decidedly remarkable. It contains much thought and unusual observation, and the style is both careful and finished."—WORLD.
"Shows fine sympathy and strength."—MORNING LEADER.
"A graceful and winning story."—ATHENÆUM.
"Gentle, dignified, illumined, yet marked by a curiously characteristic quality of evoking emotion."—STANDARD.

N.B.—Our New List, with Portraits, will be forwarded free on application.

25,000 Copies sold in America.

1. THE HOUSE OF A THOUSAND CANDLES

By MEREDITH NICHOLSON.

FOURTH EDITION NOW READY. Price 6s.

Truth.—"The reader's attention is not allowed to relax until 'Finis' is written."
Star.—"The plot is almost impregnably clever. You cannot guess the secret till very near the end. The perilous position of the hero is very cheering. You feel that he is bound to be killed on every page. The fight in the dark between him and Morgan is very soothing. I like the thought of two men crawling in a gloomy subterranean corridor and firing revolvers at each other. It must be quite exciting. You could not know what moment would be the next. The other complications in this lively book are very ingenious, and on the whole I think it is the finest novel of pure sensation we have had for years."
Literary World.—"The dénouement is unique, and will, we venture to suppose never be guessed by the most experienced reader. The book is brightly written, and the interest never fails."

2. MR. PRATT

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY. Price 6s.

Daily Mail.—"It is a delightful tale. The book is full of genuine humour, and 'Mr. Pratt' is racy of the soil. All the rest is pure joy. Van Brunt's efforts to sail a boat, and his and Hartley's endeavours to cultivate the sandy soil of the Hermitage, their catching of clams—all is good for hearty and innocuous laughter. We do not know if this is a 'best-selling' book in America; but we do know it ought to be."
Daily Telegraph.—"For those healthy people who like to laugh when they read, this is a book that may be heartily recommended."
Morning Post.—"'Mr. Pratt' is quite fresh and readable."
Queen.—"Bright and humorous throughout."
Ladies' Field.—"Their experiences are described with irresistible comicality. Mr. Lincoln's humour is fresh and abundant."
Scotsman.—"Distinctly a clever piece of work."

3. SEEING FRANCE WITH UNCLE JOHN

By ANNE WARNER.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY. Price 5s.

Numerous Illustrations by M. W. PRESTON.

Yorkshire Post.—"Not since Jerome's 'Three Men in a Boat' do we remember a more amusing tale of travel."
Telegraph.—"Described with rare humour . . . decidedly entertaining."
Notts Guardian.—"A rollicking, laughable book, appealing to the same sense of humour as Mark Twain's 'Tramp Abroad' . . . the work gains immensely from the clever illustrations."

4. THE SOCIAL SECRETARY

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS.

With Illustrations by CLARENCE E. UNDERWOOD.

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 5s.

A charming young girl undertakes to pilot the family of a self-made millionaire through the difficulties of a successful entrance into the exclusive circles of Washington society. Nearly every page causes hearty laughter.

Glasgow News.—"The author is humorous and witty, and the tone throughout is good. All the characters are drawn with effect and skill."
Daily Express.—"Written with skill and humour."
Scotsman.—"A phase of social life in Washington is depicted with much cleverness and humour . . . Admirable delineation of character."

5. THE IMPERSONATOR THE IMPERSONATOR

By MARY IMLAY TAYLOR,
Author of "My Lady Clancarty."

JUST PUBLISHED. Price 6s.

Liverpool Post.—"A capable novelist. . . . Always bright and most agreeable, the book has that vague quality which can only be described as 'charm.'"

London: GAY & BIRD, 22 & 13, Bedford-street, Strand.

1. Romance.
2. Drama.
3. Realism.
4. Sentiment.

1. "The Amazing Duke." By Sir William Magnay, Bart. (6s.) A thrilling romance of the time of Charles II., in which the Duke of Buckingham figures prominently. "Under the Pompadour." By Edward W. Jennings. (6s.). Strong passion and exciting incident mark this fine romance of the days of the Marquise de Pompadour.

2. "The Shulamite." By Alice and Claude Askew. (6s.) A revised edition of this dramatic story, containing portraits of Miss Lena Ashwell and Mr. McKinnel.

3. "The Sacrifice." By Alphonse Courlander. (6s.) The Bystander says:—"It is, indeed, powerful."

4. "A Man's Love." By Dorothy Summers. (6s.). "A clever and well-handled intrigue of courtship and love-making."—Scotsman.

Published by T. Fisher Unwin.

THE SUREST MEANS OF OBTAINING HEALTH.

Dr. Andrew Wilson's Idea.

Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., has just issued from the press an engrossing booklet which will set people thinking. In this booklet, "The Art of Living," he says :—

"Many people merely exist—they live in a state in which they may be described as being neither very ill nor very well. Persons in this state do not get the most out of life and they cannot attain to the best in the way of living. They cannot do their work in a satisfactory fashion. Work which should be easily performed becomes a toil to them. As a writer has said, they feel 'the burden of living.' Now in a typical state of health living should be no burden at all.

"I should define health as that condition in which every duty of life is performed without pain or discomfort. Whenever we are ill we infringe, so to speak, this definition. The little ailment, equally with the serious one, implies pain to a certain extent, and it renders the sufferer a less effective worker. Besides, loss of health, or even feebleness, has its economic side. It entails loss of money, by reason of inability to discharge the duties that lie to our hand.

"Our first duty to ourselves is to check illness, if we can, at the outset. Suppose a person has 'run down,' as the saying goes, in his bodily health. He feels languid and is easily tired.

"Probably he will be advised, and rightly, to take a 'tonic.' This in the main is good advice, but if there exists any preparation which can combine in itself the properties of a 'tonic' and restorative, and which at the same time can contribute to the nourishment and building-up of the enfeebled body, it is evident such an agent must prove of the utmost value to everybody.

"I have found such a tonic and restorative in the preparation known as Sanatogen. Recovering from an attack of influenza and suffering from the severe weakness incidental to that ailment, Sanatogen was brought under my notice. I gave it a fair trial, and the results were all that could have been desired. In a short time my appetite improved, the weakness was conquered, and without the use of any other medicine or preparation I was restored to health. It is this personal experience of Sanatogen which leads me to recommend it so strongly in all cases of weakness. I do not wonder, after my own experience (duplicated I may say in the case of friends), that medical men both at home and abroad prescribe Sanatogen in many instances of ordinary weakness as well as in those of actual disease.

"What is Sanatogen? is a query which may be answered by saying that it is in no sense a 'secret' remedy. Its composition is well known, otherwise medical men would not prescribe it. It combines two distinct elements, one tonic, and the other nutritive. This is how Sanatogen comes to act specially as a brain and nerve tonic, bracing up the great nerve centres, and restoring them so that they will adequately discharge their duties in governing our frames."

The publishers of Dr. Andrew Wilson's little work are Messrs. F. Williams & Co., 83, Upper Thames Street, London, E.C., and they are sending free of cost specimen copies of the whole booklet to every bona fide applicant who wishes to know all about Sanatogen, and names Truth in his note of application. Sanatogen, by the way, is sold in packets at 1s. 9d., 2s. 9d., 5s., and 9s. 6d., and can be obtained from any chemist.

OUR PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,466.

The near approach—unusually early this year—of the Oxford and Cambridge Boat-race suggests to me that now is a convenient opportunity to set a Puzzle that shall appeal to those of our Competitors who are interested in rowing.

I am, therefore, offering the usual Prize of Two Guineas this week to that Competitor who shall send in

THE MOST ACCURATE FORECAST OF THE RESULT OF THE FORTHCOMING BOAT-RACE, GIVING THE NAME OF THE WINNING CREW, THE OFFICIAL TIME OCCUPIED BY THEM IN ROWING THE COURSE, THE RELATIVE POSITION OF THE BOATS AT (I.) THE THAMES BOAT CLUB, (II.) HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE, (III.) BARNES BRIDGE, AND THE NUMBER OF LENGTHS, OR FRACTIONS OF LENGTHS, BY WHICH VICTORY IS FINALLY SECURED.

Any solution which gives the wrong winner cannot, of course, be entertained. But subject to this, the Prize will be awarded to that Competitor who solves the remaining five problems most accurately.

PLEASE NOTE THAT:

(i) No Competitor must send in more than one forecast.

(ii) All Forecasts must reach TRUTH Office by the last post on Monday, March 11, at latest.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORTEX.—I am much obliged by your letter. I cannot help thinking, however, that I have heard the answer of the riddle which you propound, and that it has some connection with "soles and eels," though I cannot recall the exact metrical form in which it runs.

LIBRA.—Very sorry your nom-de-plume was incorrectly printed. I will see that the error is not repeated.

LITTLE BEN.—Your nom-de-plume has already been noted. Very pleased indeed to number you among our Competitors.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,463.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

EPIGRAMMATIC ESSAYS, SUPPLYING SOME PLAUSIBLE REASON FOR THE DECLINE AND FALL OF VALENTINE'S DAY.

That the sending of Valentines has fallen into desuetude is due: (1) To the gradual deterioration of what was many centuries ago a happy and pretty custom—the interchange of presents between the sexes—to which Pepys in his diary quaintly alludes; but within the knowledge of many of us it has degenerated into a kind of "Fescennina licentia,"* when a few indulge in lampooning and vulgarly caricaturing people's peculiarities. (2) To the reason that presents or cards are sent in such profusion at Christmas and the New Year, and even Easter, that Valentines have almost sunk into oblivion. Simplex.

* Horace.

Valentine was a martyr priest of Rome who, tradition says, converted the drawing of lots on the Festival of Juno Februata into the custom of sending messages of affection amongst Christians. In time these became messages between the sexes, especially in England and France. At last they degenerated into vulgar and often scurrilous and indecent, coarse, coloured pictures, and decent folk gave them up. The custom of young acquaintances greeting one another first thing in the morning on Valentine's Day as Valentine or Valentina has also come to an end since coarse hooligans shouted Valentina at every girl they met. Nemo.

Valentine's Day, like the last century, is quite out of date. A hundred years ago our girls were so guarded that they never could know what a lover meant until he declared himself to her parents. So the swain invented the fashion of sending a picture letter to his fair one, or sometimes a valuable gift, to let her know his feelings. This is quite unnecessary now, when girls can meet men on golf, hockey, or any other sporting ground, without a chaperon. In fact, the emancipation of women has quite done away with the gentle hint of a Valentine. Frances.

Hic jacet. Saint Valentine of blessed memory! Patron-in-Ordinary to all true lovers! Peace be with you!—though you had no more to do with patronising the frivolous fancies of fleeting youth than the Man-in-the-Iron-Mask. You are now, alas! only a memory indeed, but, it appears, not of unalloyed sweetness. For, sad to say, your remembrance is inalienably associated in all our minds with certain twopenny red-and-black abominations of bounders, boozers, and snakes-in-the-grass that have been in the habit of appearing about your time. Therewith the dainty and delightful custom of exchanging flowered greetings lapsed. The Philistines again, O Valentine! The rest is silence. Rimabel.

Why tell your girl you love her in gold and Cupids on February 14, when on December 25 you told her ditto in silver and angels? Why send her a letter with a pretty picture on it, on one—when you can send her a pretty picture with a postcard on it, on any—day of the year? Why waste time, stationery, and postage, when the harmless, necessary telephone is always with us?—

"Hallo! Are you there? Valentine's Day—I adore you, dar——conf—ound!—Good-bye!"

That's how we do it, and why we don't do it. Hence these idle tears. Islander.

About the middle of last century the cult of St. Valentine, previously abandoned as vulgar by the classes, culminated among the masses. These have ever since grown year by year more practical. Arry deems money better spent on treats and trinkets than on silver-laced sentimentality. Arriet prefers appreciable gifts and significant company-keeping to conventional effusions—unsigned, and therefore unconvincing in actions for breach of promise. Both, having floundered at school through a course of "Poetic Readers," deride the namby-pamby, love-dove, heart-dart anthology of Cupid which, damned alike by common sense and smart Society, no longer overburdens the postman. Eboracum.

One of the effects of the establishment of the penny post was an immense increase in the sending of Valentines. So great became the rage for these literary absurdities that it caused a serious hindrance to commercial correspondence. Some one suggested that useful presents should be substituted for Valentines. The idea was almost universally adopted, and nearly every one felt it a duty to send a useful present to some one else. This in its turn became a burden to society, and St. Valentine became an "old man of the sea." But he had gradually so thoroughly displaced the old-fashioned Valentine that it never recovered itself, and probably never will.—Libra.

Valentines disappeared because more can be got out of Christmas cards. The former were made by hand in England; the latter are produced in Germany in unlimited quantities by cheap mechanical processes, which enable dealers to effect enormous sales at substantial profits.

The more costly Valentine appealed mainly to young people of ardent temperament, whereas the cards appeal to all ages, conditions, and requirements; and there seems no longer reason why Edwin should wait till February and pay half-a-crown, when he can apprise Angelina of his amorous condition a couple of months earlier for twopence.—Ephemeron.
